PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE SIXTY-SEVENTH CONGRESS FOURTH SESSION.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, January 23, 1923.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. J. J. Muir, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father, we are dependent upon Thee, and in that dependence there is given unto us the privilege of recognizing Thee in all the demands and duties of life. And we come this morning asking that with the brightness of the day there may be in each soul a real sunshine of hope, of larger possibilities and richer opportunities in the great services of the daily life. Hear and help us continually, and give us grace to do Thy will. Through Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

NAMING A PRESIDING OFFICER.

The Secretary, George A. Sanderson, read the following communication:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE,
Washington, D. C., January 23, 1923.

To the Senate:

Being temporarily absent from the Senate, I appoint Hon. GEORGE H. MOSES, a Senator from the State of New Hampshire, to perform the duties of the Chair this legislative day.

ALBERT B. CUMMINS,
President pro tempore.

Mr. MOSES thereupon took the chair as Presiding Officer.

The reading clerk proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Sunday, January 21, 1923, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

REPORT OF EAST WASHINGTON HEIGHTS TRACTION RAILROAD CO.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the annual report of the East Washington Heights Traction Railroad Co., made pursuant to law, for the calendar year 1922, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

DEPARTMENTAL USE OF AUTOMOBILES.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a communication from the Director General of Railroads, in response to Senate Resolution 399, agreed to January 6, 1923, relative to the number and use of automobiles by the United States Railroad Administration, which was ordered to lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of Commerce, transmitting, in response to Senate Resolution 399, agreed to January 6, 1923, a report relative to the number and cost of maintenance of motor vehicles used in the Department of Commerce in the District of Columbia, which was ordered to lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, respecting Senate Resolution 399, agreed to January 6, 1923, relative to passenger automobiles used by the department, stating that steps had been taken to secure the information called for and report would be made at the earliest practicable date, which was ordered to lie on the table.

TAXATION OF STOCK DIVIDENDS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, reporting, in response to Senate Resolution 409, agreed to January 17, 1923, information relative to penalties imposed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue pursuant to section 220, Internal Revenue Laws of 1921, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, January 20, 1923.

The PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I have received the resolution of the Senate, No. 409, passed January 17, 1923, which the Secretary of the Senate transmitted to me with his letter dated January 16, 1923.

This resolution, after referring to a report from the Federal Trade Commission that "328 corporations have released surpluses by the stock-dividend plan during the calendar year 1922, reaching more than $2,149,151,425," quotes in part the provisions of section 220 of the revenue act of 1921, and requests the Secretary of the Treasury to furnish the Senate "the names of companies, amounts, and dates of penalties, if any, imposed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue during said year of 1922, pursuant to the provisions of section 220, Internal Revenue Laws of 1921."

Section 220 of the revenue act of 1921, approved November 23, 1921, provides that if any corporation, however created or organized, is formed or availed of for the purpose of preventing the imposition of the surtax upon its stockholders through the medium of permitting its gains and profits to accumulate instead of being divided or distributed, there shall be levied upon the net income of the corporation a tax of 25 per cent, in addition to the other taxes imposed upon corporations, but that the fact that the gains and profits are permitted to accumulate and become surplus shall not be construed as evidence of a purpose to escape the surtax unless the Commissioner of Internal Revenue certifies that in his opinion such accumulation is unreasonable for the purposes of the business.

The revenue act of 1921, of which section 220 is a part, became effective for the taxable year 1921, and for subsequent years. The first returns filed under the revenue act of 1921 were not received by the Bureau of Internal Revenue until March, 1922, and the returns have not yet been examined because of the heavy pressure to dispose of the extraordinary accumulation of returns for the years 1917, 1918, and 1919. It is likely to be several months before the audit and examination of these 1921 returns can be put under way. The returns for the year 1922, the year to which Senate Resolution 409 seems to have particular reference, have not as yet been received by the Bureau of Internal Revenue, and are not due until March 15, 1923. Since the penalty imposed by section 220 may be assessed only after the Commissioner of Internal Revenue certifies, in the light of data obtained from the income-tax return, that in his opinion the accumulation of gains and profits by the corporation is unreasonable for the purposes of the business, it will be readily understood that no occasion has yet arisen to invoke against any corporation the penalty imposed by section 220 of the revenue act of 1921.

In this connection it is proper to point out that there seems to be much misapprehension as to the effect of section 220 of the revenue act of 1921. It applies to corporations formed or availed of for the purpose of preventing the imposition of the surtax upon the stockholders through the medium of permitting gains or profits to accumulate instead of being distributed. It expressly provides, however, that the fact that the gains and profits are in any case permitted to accumulate and become surplus shall not be considered as evidence of a purpose to escape the tax unless the Commissioner of Internal Revenue certifies that in his opinion such accumulation is unreasonable for the purposes of the business. The section does not impose a tax on undistributed profits or on accumulated surplus, but puts a penalty on the accumulation of gains and profits beyond the reasonable needs of the business when made for the purpose of escaping the surtax.

There is at the same time much confusion as to the relation of the declaration of a stock dividend to the application of section 220. Senate Resolution 409 refers in the preamble to the report of the Federal Trade Commission that 328 corporations have declared stock dividends during the calendar year 1922. The declaration of a stock dividend has no significance under section 220, and in any case where the section applies the department can proceed with its enforcement quite as well after as before the declaration of a stock dividend. The declaration of a stock dividend does not relieve corporations from section 220, nor, on the other hand, does it indicate that a corporation has accumulated gains or profits beyond the reasonable needs of the business, for the entire amount of the surplus capitalized by the declaration of the stock dividend may be invested in plant, equipment, and inventory, or be needed as working capital, or it may have been accumulated before the high surtaxes became effective and quite without regard to their possible application. Furthermore, the receipt of a stock dividend by itself has no effect upon the tax liability of the recipient, since the holder of stock in a corporation after the receipt of a stock dividend has altogether no more than he had before. This was aptly expressed by the Supreme Court in Eisner v. Macomber (252 U. S. 189), as follows:

"This, however—declaration of a stock dividend—is merely book-keeping that does not affect the aggregate assets of the corporation or its outstanding liabilities; . . . it does not alter the preexisting proportionate interest of any stockholder or increase the intrinsic value of his holding or of the aggregate holdings of the other stockholders as they stood before. The new certificates simply increase the number of the shares, with consequent dilution of the value of each share."

As I have already stated, there have necessarily been no cases as yet in which the penalty imposed by section 220 of the revenue act of 1921 has been invoked, and there is therefore nothing to report at this time.

Very truly yours,

A. W. MELLON,
Secretary of the Treasury.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask to have printed in the RECORD and to lie on the table resolutions adopted by the fifty-second annual meeting of the State board of agriculture, at Topeka, Kans., covering several subjects.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolutions adopted at the fifty-second annual meeting of the State board of agriculture, at Topeka, January 12, 1923.

Resolved, That we commend our Congressmen and Senators in Washington for their efforts to relieve the condition of agriculture by Federal legislation, and we especially indorse the action of the "agricultural bloc" in compelling a full recognition of the importance of agriculture in its relation to the other industries in the United States.

Resolved, That we earnestly protest against the enactment of the Federal bill commonly known as the ship subsidy bill.

Resolved, That we believe that everything necessary should be done to restore the farmers' market. For our surplus production, this market is overreached. We can not recover those markets until Europe recovers stability.

We therefore urge that the President of the United States, at an early date, summon a financial and economic conference at Washington, especially inviting those nations of Europe that are natural customers of the American farmer. We believe that the foreign debt funding law, or such amendments as will give the President liberty of action to make necessary concessions to our customers, subject to the approval of Congress, is wise.

We also suggest that this resolution be submitted to the chambers of commerce and other civic bodies for their indorsements.

Resolved, Realizing that milk, the product of the cow, is a food that has no substitute, and that the dairy industry of this State is a source of large income to our farmers; and in view of the fact that efforts have been and are being made to manufacture so-called milk substitutes by extracting therefrom the butterfat and substituting in its place coconut oil and other oils having little or no food value, offering same to the public as milk or as a product equal to milk:

We, the Kansas State Board of Agriculture, in annual meeting assembled, respectfully and most urgently recommend to the Legislature of Kansas its earnest consideration of adequate legislation prohibiting the manufacture and sale within this State of the product known as "filled milk" or "imitation milk."

We also respectfully call the attention of the legislature to the fact that farmers received approximately $14,000,000 during the year 1922 for butterfat sold to creameries for manufacture into butter, and these figures, not including farm butter manufactured, whole milk, and sweet cream sold for ice cream and other purposes, but that while it is well known that there is no substitute for butter, oleomargarine, due to our present lack of protective legislation, is offered for sale as a substitute for butter, and that it is oftentimes advertised as a product of the cow;

We therefore respectfully and urgently recommend to the Legislature of Kansas its consideration of legislation regulating the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine, and which will protect the interests of dairy farmers of this State, in which no coconut or other similar oils are produced.

Resolved, That a determined effort be made to have the rules governing distribution of grain cars changed, either by the American Railway Association or by an order of the Interstate Commerce Commission, so that distribution of grain cars can be made on the basis of grain receipts under normal conditions and before shipments were curtailed by the car shortage.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I send to the desk a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of South Dakota, asking Congress to give consideration to House bill 13574, relating to an appropriation for a monument at Fort Pierre, S. Dak., to commemorate the explorations and discoveries of the Verendrye brothers, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD. Let me say that House bill 13574 is identical with Senate bill 4350.

The concurrent resolution of the Legislature of South Dakota was referred to the Committee on the Library, as follows:

Senate concurrent resolution memorializing Congress to give careful and favorable consideration to House bill 13574.

Whereas on the 30th day of March, 1743, the Verendrye brothers, commissioned by the King of France, did at the present site of the city of Fort Pierre, S. Dak., make formal claim to the region now embraced in the northwestern States of our Union, and in witness of such claim did bury in the earth a plate of lead upon which was inscribed the evidence of such claim; and

Whereas while history records such event the exact place of the burying of such evidence of claim remained a mystery until Sunday, the 17th day of February, 1913, a period of 170 years, when some school children while engaged in play accidentally discovered and secured same, which evidence is now the property of South Dakota; and

Whereas while this matter is, of course, of interest to the State of South Dakota, but in a broader sense of national historical moment, not, of course, in a class with Plymouth Rock, but of far more moment from a national historical event than many others which have been recognized; and

Whereas a bill is now pending in Congress, known as H. R. 13574, providing for the properly marking of the site as an event in national history worthy of consideration: Therefore be it

Resolved by the senate of the State of South Dakota (the house of representatives concurring), That it is the desire of this body that a careful and conscientious consideration of the merits of H. R. 13574 be given by the Members of Congress, individually and collectively, and if your honorable bodies find that the event from a national historical standpoint warrants your favorable consideration the citizens of this great State will ever cherish the memory of your acts, but if upon such careful consideration you deem the matter unworthy of your favorable consideration we will abide by your decision uncomplainingly; be it further

Resolved, That engrossed copies of this preamble and resolution be prepared by the secretary of the senate, signed by the presiding officers of the senate and house of representatives, and forwarded to Congressman WILLIAMSON, the Secretary of the Senate, the Chief Clerk of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to his honor the President of the United States, Warren G. Harding.

CARL GUNBERSON,
President of the Senate.
A. B. BLAKE,
Secretary of the Senate.
E. O. FRESCOLN,
Speaker of the House.
WRIGHT HARBELL,
Chief Clerk of the House.

Mr. BROOKHART presented the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of Iowa, which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

A concurrent resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States with reference to a constitutional amendment affecting tax-exempt securities.

Be it resolved by the senate (the house concurring):

Whereas there has been issued and placed upon the market tax-exempt securities in such volume as to affect to a marked degree business conditions throughout the Nation; and

Whereas by reason of such volume of tax-exempt securities money has been steadily and to an increasing extent leaving other channels of investment in such securities to the injury of other securities, with the net result that interest rates have steadily increased; and

Whereas the issuance of such tax-exempt securities has steadily decreased the amount of visible and intangible property subject to taxation, thus increasing to an unwarranted degree the burden imposed upon other classes of property; and

Whereas it is essential and necessary and for the best interests of the Nation as a whole that a constitutional inhibition against the issuance of such tax-exempt securities is necessary to accomplish uniformity throughout the Nation: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the senate (the house concurring), That it is the judgment of the Fortieth General Assembly of the State of Iowa that an amendment to the Constitution of the United States prohibiting the issuance of such securities should be proposed by Congress and submitted to the several States for adoption; be it further

Resolved, That engrossed copies of this resolution be, and they are hereby, ordered presented to the President of the United States, to the Hon. ALBERT B. CUMMINS and the Hon. SMITH W. BROOKHART, Senators of the State of Iowa, and to each of the Members of Congress from the State of Iowa.

JOHN HAMMILL,
President of the Senate.
L. W. AINSWORTH,
Secretary of the Senate.
J. H. ANDERSON,
Speaker of the House.
A. C. GUSTAFSON,
Chief Clerk of the House.

Mr. NICHOLSON presented a resolution adopted by the congregation of the Second Presbyterian Church, of Fort Collins, Colo., favoring action by the Federal Government granting relief to the suffering peoples of the Near East, especially the Armenians, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. LADD presented a resolution of the board of directors of the Leith National Farm Loan Association, of Leith, N. Dak., protesting against the passage of the so-called Strong and Norbeck bills amending certain sections of the Federal farm loan act, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

He also presented a petition of 58 citizens of Streeter, N. Dak., praying for the passage of legislation extending immediate aid to the famine-stricken peoples of the German and Austrian Republics, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. McLEAN presented a resolution of Windham County Branch, New England Milk Producers' Association, of Moosup, Conn., favoring the prompt passage of the so-called Voigt filled milk bill, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of New Canaan, Conn., praying for an amendment to the Constitution regulating child labor, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented communications in the nature of petitions of the women's board of missions of the Congregational Churches of New Haven and the Council of Jewish Women, Bozrahville Section, of Bozrahville, both in the State of Connecticut, praying for the granting of relief and assistance to the suffering peoples of Armenia and the Near East, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a memorial of members of the Laymen's Service League, Protestant Episcopal parishes of Danbury, Bethel, Redding, Newton, and Ridgefield, in the State of Connecticut, remonstrating against the passage of legislation designed to take away the lands of Pueblo Indians, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CALDER, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which was referred the resolution (S. Res. 411) appointing a committee to investigate and report upon the problem for a 9-foot channel in the waterway from the Great Lakes to the Gulf of Mexico, reported it without amendment.

Mr. SPENCER submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $6,300 for supervision of destitute children in their own homes to determine whether they can under the law be permitted to remain at their homes, intended to be proposed by him to House bill 13660, the District of Columbia appropriation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

CALCIUM ARSENATE.

Mr. FLETCHER. I offer the resolution which I send to the desk and I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration. It relates to an important matter affecting the interests of agriculture.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida offers a resolution, which will be read for the information of the Senate.

The reading clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 417), as follows:

Resolved, That the Federal Trade Commission be, and it is hereby, directed to investigate and report the facts relating to any alleged violations of the antitrust acts by manufacturers of or dealers in calcium arsenate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution. Is there objection?

Mr. KELLOGG. I object.

Mr. DIAL. I desire to suggest to the Senator from Florida that it might be very well to place a time limit in the resolution as to when the Federal Trade Commission shall report on the matter referred to therein. I am a pretty strong supporter of the Federal Trade Commission, but I fear sometimes that they are taking a little nap at the switch.

Mr. FLETCHER. I should prefer to leave the resolution as it now stands.

Mr. KELLOGG. I object to the consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. FLETCHER. I hope there will be no objection to the resolution. I think there will be no discussion of it.

Mr. KELLOGG. I do not know whether or not there will be discussion of the resolution, but the understanding was that as soon as morning business was over the Senate should take up House bill 11939, the bank bill. This probably will be the only chance to consider it, and if we get into a discussion of the antitrust laws it will last all morning.

Mr. DIAL. There will be no debate on the resolution so far as I know.

Mr. FLETCHER. There will be no debate on the resolution, and morning business has not yet been closed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution submitted by him.

Mr. KELLOGG. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota objects, and the resolution goes over under the rule.

Mr. FLETCHER. In connection with the resolution I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article appearing in the Cotton News, which has been reprinted by the New York Journal of Commerce, on the subject of calcium or white arsenate.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ARSENATE STRENGTH A FEATURE OF YEAR—SERIOUS SHORTAGE HAS DISTASTROUS EFFECT—PRICE TREBLED IN YEARS—DEMAND MUCH HEAVIER THAN USUAL OWING TO USE ON COTTON—SEEKING NEW SOURCE OF SUPPLY.

[New York Journal of Commerce.]

One of the most sensational developments of 1922 in the chemical industry and one which is of vital importance to the country as a whole, through its effect upon the production of cotton and other crops upon which the country depends, was the sensational rise in price and the great scarcity of white arsenic. The Cotton Belt during the latter part of the year was seriously alarmed over the situation. It is still at a loss to find an adequate remedy for an underproduction of several thousands of tons of a material which is very badly needed if cotton is to be grown successfully. The use of arsenical insecticides and particularly of calcium arsenate in combating the ravages of the cotton-boll weevil has grown tremendously during the past two years, since it has been shown that this particular insecticide was really efficacious when properly used.

The sensational rise in price of arsenic during the last six months of the year was accompanied by an outcry from the consumers. They claimed, among other things, that the arsenic market had been cornered, that manipulation by speculators had forced prices to their high levels, and that the farmers of the country were being mulcted by high prices and just as high profits, which were going into the pockets of sellers of a material which the farmers had to use. An investigation was sought and started. Several meetings were held in which the matter was aired and the consumers advanced their ideas on the situation.

NOT ENOUGH PRODUCED.

The real crux of the matter was and is that the production of arsenic by the smelters here, coupled with the imports which were brought in from other producing countries, lacked about 7,000 tons of being enough to take care of the tremendously inflated demand for the material. The shortages brought about high prices for imported arsenic for shipment and hence high selling prices of imported arsenic in this market. Long demand and short supply and not manipulation were the reasons for this advance.

At the outset of the year 1922 there were ample supplies of white arsenic available both in this market and for shipment in various future positions. There was little buying. Insecticide takers and other consumers were pretty well covered on contract for their 1922 spring requirements. They could not be persuaded to give a thought to the possibilities of securing cheap supplies for the coming year. Instead, they contrasted the price of 6 cents per pound with the pre-war price of 2½ cents per pound and looked for a decline. They wholly overlooked the lack of domestic production due to the depression in the copper industry. They also overlooked the fact that demand during the 1923 insecticide season promised to be greater than ever before, owing to the use of the material as a boll-weevil killer. A few of the farsighted ones, the glass trade in particular, did buy their arsenic at the low prices then prevailing. The others, and particularly the insecticide manufacturers, could not be persuaded to purchase even when they were shown definite statistics and really worth-while arguments as to why they should take this course.

The dealers in arsenic did realize the situation. About the middle of the year they began to buy up foreign supplies for shipment. The insecticide trade still held off. The price rose at first slowly and then more rapidly until in October it had practically doubled. Then, and not until then, did the producers of insecticides begin to display any real concern over the situation. It was at about this time that they began to see a "corner in arsenic" and other nonexistent things. They did not apparently realize that arsenic was high then, only because it had been low in the spring, when they could have purchased and did not. Briefly, that is the history of the arsenic shortage for the year 1922 and the spring of 1923.

MUST FIND NEW SOURCES.

All this, however, is now past. The insecticide producers are paying high prices this year, and so will the ultimate consumers. The production is a short one. It would seem that now is the time to look to the supplies which may be expected to be produced and used next year. Should production and imports be normal, there will be about 10,000 tons of arsenic available during the coming season. Reliable information is to the effect that this is not nearly enough to take care of the anticipated demand. New sources of production must be sought and found if a repetition of this year's high prices is to be avoided. Thus far comparatively little has been accomplished along this line.

Only one plant to date has actually produced arsenical insecticides directly from arsenic-bearing ores. The Salt Lake Insecticide Co., working under a process devised by Dr. Frank Cameron, has succeeded in doing something along this line. This one plant has done well, but it is not enough. There are plenty of arsenic ores in the United States. It is true that not all of them are as rich in arsenic or carry it in as available a form as those in Utah now being worked. On the other hand, the need for arsenic is so pressing that it will be necessary and probably profitable to turn to some of the other ores for supplies. Companies interested in the situation say that they will produce all the arsenic required if they can get guaranties that it will bring them 10 cents per pound. This guaranty is at best a rather visionary scheme. On the other hand, it is possible that arsenic, under present conditions of demand, will bring 10 cents and more for some time to come. Foreign sources can not be expected to ship much more than they are shipping at present, and domestic production in the copper industry will not be sufficient to take care of the demand under normal conditions in the copper industry.

The solution of the problem seems to rest in some scheme for direct production. It is believed that the plant referred to above could be made only one of a series of such projects wherever the ore is sufficiently workable. In the meantime it is likely that processes for the use of some of the other ores will be devised. The present season can not but be one of great scarcity and high prices. These may be avoided in future by proper attention now. Delay will be fatal.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 247) authorizing the appropriation of funds for the maintenance of public order and the protection of life and property during the convention of the Imperial Council of the Mystic Shrine in the District of Columbia June 5, 6, and 7, 1923, and for other purposes, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 10034) relating to assuring compensation for accidental injuries or death of employees in certain occupations in the District of Columbia, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

CONVENTION OF THE IMPERIAL COUNCIL, MYSTIC SHRINE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 247) authorizing the appropriation of funds for the maintenance of public order and the protection of life and property during the convention of the Imperial Council of the Mystic Shrine in the District of Columbia June 5, 6, and 7, 1923, and for other purposes, which were, on page 1, line 3, to strike out "$25,000" and insert "$50,000"; on page 1, line 5, to strike out all after "able," down to and including "paid," in line 6, and insert "wholly"; on page 1, lines 7 and 8, to strike out "and the revenues of the United States"; on page 2, line 4, to strike out all after "Commissioners" and insert:

There is hereby further authorized to be appropriated the sum of $4,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, payable as aforesaid, for the construction, rent, maintenance, and for incidental expenses in connection with the operation of temporary public-convenience stations, first-aid stations, and information booths, including the employment of personal services in connection therewith during such period.

Mr. BALL. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 10034. An act relating to assuring compensation for accidental injuries or death of employees in certain occupations in the District of Columbia, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Morning business is closed.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the calendar, beginning with Order of Business 963, where, I understand, the consideration of the calendar was left off when it was last under consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Chair lays before the Senate Calendar No. 963.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask that that bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the Senator from Arkansas to object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. KELLOGG. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed with the consideration of House bill 11939, the banking bill.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Chair just announced that the consideration of the calendar, beginning with Order of Business 963, was in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair now understands the Senator from Utah [Mr. Smoot] stated that number inadvisably.

Mr. ROBINSON. I object to the consideration of the bill, and I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution which the Senator from Florida [Mr. Fletcher] submitted a moment ago. I understand that there will be no discussion of the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. May the Chair state to the Senator from Arkansas that the Senator from Utah, when he asked for the consideration of Order of Business No. 963, was mistaken as to the number. The Chair is now informed that the Senator from Utah desired the consideration of the calendar to begin with Order of Business No. 961. The question therefore is, Shall the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business No. 961? Is there objection?

Mr. ROBINSON. I object, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

TAXATION OF NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. KELLOGG. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bank tax bill, being House bill 11939, the bill which was under consideration when the Senate adjourned last evening.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. DIAL and Mr. FLETCHER asked for a division.

The question being put, on a division the motion was agreed to.

CALCIUM ARSENATE.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Minnesota will consent to the consideration of the resolution which has been submitted by the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]. There is no objection to the resolution, and there will be no debate on it.

Mr. ROBINSON. I will say to the Senator from Minnesota the custom of the Senate is during the morning hour to consider resolutions which involve no debate. The Senator from Florida has presented a resolution which he said would provoke no debate and require no discussion. I think the time of the Senate will be conserved and the consideration of the bill in which the Senator from Minnesota is interested will be promoted by allowing the resolution of the Senator from Florida take the usual course of such resolutions. If discussion should occur, then, of course, the objection of the Senator from Minnesota would be justified.

Mr. KELLOGG. If the consideration of the resolution will involve no debate, I shall not offer the slightest objection to the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida, the Chair understands, renews his request for unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which he previously submitted. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the resolution (S. Res. 417) submitted by Mr. FLETCHER was considered and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Federal Trade Commission be, and it is hereby, directed to investigate and report the facts relating to any alleged violations of the antitrust acts by manufacturers of or dealers in calcium arsenate.

TAXATION OF NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I now ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the calendar, beginning with Order of Business 961.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. House bill 11939 is now before the Senate by formal vote.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11939) to amend section 5219 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] to the amendment reported by the committee, which will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 4, beginning in line 1, it is proposed to amend the committee amendment by striking out the proviso there inserted and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

Provided, That whenever by any taxing district the shares in mercantile, manufacturing, or business corporations doing business therein are taxed the rate applied by said taxing district to the shares in banking associations shall not exceed the average of the rates applied by it to the shares of such other corporations or to the shares of such of them as are taxed therein.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Minnesota whether the amendment he proposes is a committee amendment or an individual amendment?

Mr. KELLOGG. I will say to the Senator the committee amendment is as printed on page 4 of the bill. After it was discussed on a previous day it was suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] and some other Senators to the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PEPPER] that the amendment was somewhat ambiguous and should be redrafted.

Mr. ROBINSON. What is the amendment to which that statement relates? The Senator says the amendment at the top of page 4.

Mr. KELLOGG. I refer to the proviso at the top of page 4.

Mr. ROBINSON. Very well.

Mr. KELLOGG. That proviso reads:

Provided, That said rate shall not exceed the average of the rates applied in said State to shares in mercantile, manufacturing, or business corporations doing business in said State or in such of said corporations as are taxed therein.

The Senator will readily realize that in the taxing of bank shares that would necessitate arriving at the average of all of the rates of the municipalities of the States and the making of a uniform State rate. That was not what was intended by the committee, as I understand from talking with the Senator from Pennsylvania. What was meant was the average of the rates applied to mercantile and other shares in the local community, as the rates differ, of course, in each community, and banks are taxed according to the rate in the local community. Therefore the Senator from Pennsylvania redrafted the amendment and it was submitted by me yesterday to cure that defect in the original provision; otherwise, the amendment is as reported by the committee.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I should like to have the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will again state the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota to the committee amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. In lieu of the proviso as printed at the top of page 4, line 1 to line 5 of the bill, inclusive, it is proposed to insert the following:

Provided, That whenever by any taxing district the shares in mercantile, manufacturing, or business corporations doing business therein are taxed, the rate applied by said taxing district to the shares in banking associations shall not exceed the average of the rates applied by it to the shares in such other corporations or to the shares of such of them as are taxed therein.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALDER. I submit an amendment to the committee amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York submits an amendment to the committee amendment, which will be read.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 5, at the end of the bill, it is proposed to insert the following:

That the act of a State legalizing, ratifying, or confirming a tax heretofore levied or assessed upon shares of national banking associations, or providing for the retention by said State of any of the tax heretofore paid, shall not be deemed hostile to, or inimical to the interests of, the United States or any agency thereof: Provided, That the amount retained, or to be retained, by such State is not in any case greater than the tax imposed for the same period upon banks, banking associations, or trust companies doing a banking business, incorporated by or under the laws of such State, or upon the moneyed capital or shares thereof.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from New York to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I understood that substantially this amendment was reported by the Banking and Currency Committee as a separate bill, and that it was agreed to be inadvisable to have the two propositions comprehended in one measure.

Mr. KELLOGG. I will say to the Senator when the bill was reported this amendment was reported as a separate bill. Subsequently—and, if I am incorrect, the Senator from Pennsylvania will correct me—it was pointed out to the committee that the House bill contained both a clause for the basis of taxing banks in the future and a ratification clause.

If the Senate should pass the bill simply with the clause pertaining to future taxation and leave out the ratification, and the ratification should be passed as a separate bill, it would not be in conference in the House. It ought to be passed with the other bill, so that both provisions could be in conference, both provisions being in the House bill. The committee, as I understand, authorized the Senator from Pennsylvania either to offer it or to consent to the offering of it as an amendment to this bill, in view of that legislative situation, and I think it should be adopted as a part of this bill.

Mr. GLASS. Very likely the committee did give that authorization, but as a member of the committee I did not. As a matter of fact, some members of the committee regarded this proposed amendment with a great deal of skepticism as to its constitutionality, and they would not have agreed to report the bill with the two amendments combined in one measure except by reserving the right to vote against it on the floor. I am not a lawyer, and it would seem rather venturesome for a layman to set up his opinion against that of trained lawyers, but I do not think the proposition now pending is constitutional, and I can not vote for the bill if it is incorporated in it.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, this amendment is known as the validating provision. I realize that there is some doubt in the minds of lawyers as to the constitutionality of this provision, but it seems to me, from a layman's examination of the subject, that it is in order and not in violation of that instrument.

As a representative of the State of New York in this body I am naturally deeply interested in this matter. Some twenty-odd years ago we were in the habit in New York State of considering bank stock and securities of like character in the same way that we would consider personal property generally, and laid a tax upon it at the same rate as real property whenever we could reach it; but, of course, in the main we never got at it. So, 21 years ago—I think 21, to be exact—our State legislature passed a bill taxing the value of the stock and of the surplus 1 per cent. That has been the law ever since. We have been collecting that tax, and it was not until three years ago, when we passed our State income tax law, taxing incomes of every character, that the question came up as to whether or not we had done the thing in a legal way.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. CALDER. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. In view of the statement which the Senator has just made, his amendment has very great significance. I recall that when the pending bill was first under consideration before the Senate the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PEPPER], who was discussing the bill, expressed some doubt as to the power of the Congress to pass what he styled a validating provision relating to the taxes heretofore levied and collected by the several States; and I wonder if the Senator from New York, appreciating that fact, would be willing to let the proposals in his amendment be considered as a separate proposition?

I can see the very great importance of the amendment to the State of New York and to other States similarly situated, but the amendment raises constitutional questions which present some difficulty to the minds of lawyers who have studied the subject. I therefore think it would be good policy to separate the questions so as to permit those who desire the passage of this bill during the present session to have their end accomplished, and also permit those who are in sympathy with the provision contained in the Senate amendment to have that passed upon. I myself should be glad to see the matter take that course.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, we submit this amendment here to-day, believing that if we fail to put it in this bill the probability is that this particular validating provision will not get through at this session. We have collected in the State of New York something over $20,000,000; and unless some such provision as this goes through, and we are given the opportunity of rectifying the mistake that we made in legislating on this subject, through our legislature, which is now in session, we shall have to return all of this money.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. CALDER. I do.

Mr. GLASS. Let me propound this inquiry to the Senator from New York: The difficulty in New York is that that State exempted from the bank tax private banking corporations. Is it proposed now to pass some retroactive law in New York taxing these private banking corporations for the same period over which it is proposed to validate the tax upon national banks?

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I have not been advised whether it is the purpose or not, or whether it is the purpose of our tax commissioner or of our State authorities to ask for that legislation. For my part, I would do it if I could; and in enacting the pending bill we propose to provide that in the future these private banks must be taxed.

Mr. GLASS. Yes; and in the future you can provide to tax national banks as they ought to be taxed, and not tax them, as you did do, as they ought not to be taxed; but in equity there is just as much reason why New York State should pass a retroactive law, if they constitutionally may, to exact taxation from private banking corporations which hitherto have been exempt, as there is for validating the illegal tax that is levied on national banks.

Mr. CALDER. I am in perfect accord with the Senator's statement, and I repeat, if I could have my way about it that would be done; but for 21 years we have been levying this tax upon our national banks, upon our State banks, and upon our trust companies, the tax being the same on all of them.

No objection was ever made by any of them. In fact, this law was made in consultation with them. The State tax commission and the city of New York authorities sat down with them and agreed upon the terms of the law. It was not until the last three years that an opportunity presented itself to get out from under; and now through a decision of our court of appeals the national banks apparently are going to secure a refund of the tax paid by them and the State banks and the trust companies will be compelled to pay the tax. I submit that these taxes were paid in the main without protest; the amount was something like $20,000,000; and unless this validating provision is agreed to the city of New York alone will have to return something like $17,000,000.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. CALDER. I do.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think it ought to be made perfectly plain, and I think the Senator from New York ought to say whether or not that is his idea—because in construing acts of Congress the courts often look to the discussion here to see what was the intention of Congress—that Congress has not the authority and we do not now claim the authority to say to the State how it shall tax and what it shall exempt from taxation. No authority or power rests in Congress to validate any State law. That is a matter entirely with the State. All that this can possibly accomplish and all, I hope, that the Senator means to accomplish by it—and, if so, that is what he ought to say now—is to say to the State of New York and to these other States where these taxes have been levied heretofore: "If you can find a way to validate your legislation, if you can find a way to make valid these assessments which are now said to be illegal because of some defect in the law, the Federal Government will make no objection to your doing so." That is all we propose to do by this bill.

Mr. CALDER. That is all we propose to do, and your provision offered by me is perfectly clear. That is the purpose of the amendment, and my only purpose.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. CALDER. I do.

Mr. SMITH. I propose to offer as an amendment to the Senator's amendment, on line 9, after the words "banking association," the words "private banker."

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, wait a moment. That would invalidate the whole thing. It would absolutely invalidate any ratification by the State of New York. We must validate the taxes which have been levied or else the whole tax is void.

Mr. SMITH. I understand that one of the troubles with which we are now faced is the mere fact that private bankers have escaped taxation. If this thing is to be operative in the future, we might pass legislation that would not be retroactive as to the private banker, but it would take care of him in the future.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield, and if so, to whom?

Mr. CALDER. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KELLOGG. This ratification has nothing to do with the future. In the future, according to this bill, all banking capital is to be taxed the same, whether it is in the hands of private banks, national banks, State banks, or trust companies. Let me say to the Senator from South Carolina, however, that in 1920, 1921, and 1922 the State of New York had a banking tax system which taxed the stock of all banks and trust companies, State banks, and national banks at 1 per cent—concededly a low rate—but it also taxed to the individual the income from dividends or stock. Private bankers were individuals, and were taxed as individuals on an income basis. Now, the only way to ratify the tax for the last three years is to ratify the tax which was levied. The State of New York has to pass the ratifying act, and if it desires retroactively to cure the tax, it can do it, and it can also add to the private bankers an equal amount of tax; but the Congress can not do it. There is only one way for the Congress to consent to this ratification, and that is to consent on the basis that the taxes were levied.

Would the Senator have the city of New York lose $20,000,000, and the banks entirely escape taxation, simply because three or four private bankers have paid an income tax rather than 1 per cent on their capital?

Mr. SMOOT. No matter in what form the law may have been worded, as I understand the Senator, the private bankers paid their pro rata share in another form, along with banks and trust companies.

Mr. KELLOGG. No; the private bankers as individuals paid an income tax, and the Supreme Court of the State of New York held, principally on the ground that as national banks were taxed 1 per cent, and money and credits in the hands of individuals were taxed on an income basis, that therefore the income tax was void. There is no man on earth who will claim that the tax of 1 per cent was an excessive tax, and if this bill is not passed, New York State will have to pay back from $25,000,000 to $30,000,000, and the banks absolutely escape any taxes whatever. If the Senate wants to turn it down, it can do so.

Mr. SMOOT. Let me ask the Senator a question.

Mr. KELLOGG. I will answer it.

Mr. SMOOT. The Legislature of the State of New York has to validate the legislation?

Mr. KELLOGG. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. Therefore, why should we pass it?

Mr. KELLOGG. Because they can not validate it without the consent of Congress. The Legislature of New York can not validate anything along this line without the consent of Congress, because banks can only be taxed by the consent of Congress, and in the manner Congress provides.

Mr. SMOOT. I doubt very much whether the Congress of the United States has that power.

Mr. KELLOGG. The Supreme Court has held over and over again that Congress has the power, and there can not be any doubt about it.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator means national banks?

Mr. KELLOGG. National banks, certainly. The court has held over and over again that Congress has the power to direct how national banks are to be taxed, and Congress has the power to consent to the ratification of any tax which Congress could originally have consented to.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. CALDER. I do.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of course, it is undoubted that Congress has the right to tax national banks.

Mr. SMOOT. There never was any doubt about that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But after the Supreme Court of the United States had decided, very early in our history, that a State could not tax them because they were fiscal agencies of the Federal Government, and the power of taxation carried the power to destroy, it has been equally fixed that the States can not do it. Now, there is presented rather an interesting question as to whether Congress can authorize a State to perform an unconstitutional act.

Mr. KELLOGG. The Senator misunderstood me.

Mr. WILLIAMS. One moment, if the Senator please. In other words, the question is presented whether Congress can waive any of the constitutional immunities and privileges of the Federal Government. If Congress could do that, it seems to me Congress could change the Constitution itself.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, the Senator from Mississippi entirely misunderstood me. I said that the States could not tax national banks except by the consent of Congress. Congress consented in 1864 and in 1868 to the States levying a tax against the stock of national banks, provided the tax was not greater than that levied on other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is that the proper statement? Did not Congress itself levy the tax and enact that it should go to the States?

Mr. KELLOGG. No; Congress did not levy the tax. Congress simply consented that the States might levy the tax. Congress has never levied a tax on banks or bank stock. The point I make is that what Congress could originally consent to it can consent to the States ratifying. That has been held by the authorities over and over again, and I say right now that unless the Congress gives this consent, not only the State of New York but the State of Massachusetts and many other States are going to lose entirely from three to six years' taxes levied on national banks.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CALDER. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. So that the Senator from Minnesota may know what I had in mind, I want to make this statement: I have no doubt but that the Congress can give consent to the States to impose taxes upon national banks, but the question arises in my mind, Has Congress the power, under the Constitution, to grant to a State the power to remit taxes which have already been collected?

Mr. KELLOGG. That is not what this bill provides for.

Mr. SMOOT. That is what it would accomplish, or there is no need of its being here.

Mr. KELLOGG. The bill simply authorizes the State to ratify the taxes which have already been collected by the State. That is all it does.

Mr. SMOOT. Not for the future.

Mr. KELLOGG. No; but for the past.

Mr. SMOOT. The taxes have been collected in the past.

Mr. KELLOGG. If the Senator wants me to read the authorities—

Mr. SMOOT. I have no doubt but that from the time of the passage of the act they would have the authority to do it, but I doubt whether—

Mr. KELLOGG. If I must read to the Senator from Utah again all the authorities which I read the other day, I will do it. The Supreme Court of the United States have settled it.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not ask the Senator to do that at all.

Mr. KELLOGG. I can read them again. They are in a brief here.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President—

Mr. CALDER. If the Senator from Pennsylvania will permit me just to make one statement, I shall be glad to yield. I just want in a word to make New York State's position clear again, if I may.

Under the Federal authority for 18 years the State of New York taxed national banks 1 per cent upon the value of their stock, and we collected it. Previous to passing the law levying that tax, however, we were attempting to collect from the individual owner of national-bank stock the personal tax we levied upon all personal property. We agreed with the trust companies, with the State banks, with the National banks, that the tax upon them should be 1 per cent.

That went on for 18 years and the tax was not disputed. It was not until we passed a State income tax law that it was disputed, and now our courts have held that we must return twenty-odd million dollars to the national banks in our State. We are not required to turn the taxes back to the State banks and trust companies. Unless we have some such relief as this, validating the previous collection, and permitting our legislature to pass an act to conform to the decision of our Supreme Court the State of New York will have to give back about $20,000,000.

I submit that the lawyers of New York, the lawyers there of great capacity familiar with tax matters, who saw the loophole in this thing, have gone through it, and we should do our part here to permit the States to save this sum if it can be done.

Mr. GLASS. Is it quite accurate to say that it is $25,000,000? I have seen the statement made that it is less than $12,000,000.

Mr. KELLOGG. I have the statement of the tax commissioner of New York that it is $20,000,000 in the city of New York alone.

Mr. SMOOT. It would not make any difference in the principle whether it was one million or twenty million.

Mr. KELLOGG. It makes a good deal of difference to the city of New York, and to Boston, in the State of Massachusetts, it means over $12,000,000. I do not know what it is going to be in Minnesota and South Dakota and other States where suits are now pending.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I wish to advert to what was said by the Senator from Virginia a few moments ago respecting the attitude of the committee upon the question now under discussion. The committee conceived that the question involved in this so-called validating proposal is not a question of power on the part of Congress or a question of delegated power on the part of the State. The committee understood, I think, that the statement last made by the Senator from Minnesota is the correct one, namely, that the States have inherent power to tax property within their limits, including the shares of national banks, but that they are restricted from the exercise of that power in the case of national banks, because, as they are fiscal agencies of the Federal Government, and the power to tax is the power to hamper or destroy, the exercise of the power by the State might be inimical to the National Government and contravene its fiscal policy.

Therefore the Congress, in order to make it clear that the exercise of taxing power by the State in the case of national-bank shares is not inimical to the Federal policy, enacted the legislation which is now embodied in section 5219 of the Revised Statutes. That section specifies certain conditions and limitations upon which the power of the State to tax may be exercised. Those conditions and limitations were not observed by certain States, and taxes were levied in the exercise of the States' plenary power of taxation, but in such a way as not to conform to the conditions of consent stated by the Congress in the legislation to which I have referred.

Thereupon the question arose whether taxes collected under that State legislation would have to be refunded to the taxpayer or whether the State might retain them. It seemed to the committee that that gave rise to the question whether or not a State legislature may constitutionally declare that taxes already collected under legislation which did not observe the restrictions imposed by Congress could, nevertheless, be kept in the treasury of the State, and the committee conceived that the answer to that question was clearly no, unless the Congress were to declare that, so far as the Federal policy is concerned, there were no objections on the part of the Congress to the doing of that thing by a State if it constitutionally could be done.

The question whether, after such a declaration by Congress, the State may constitutionally do that thing is a question upon which members of the committee are divided. The Senator from Virginia and I were among those who were at least skeptical on the subject. I think that both of us felt that when the time comes for the State to pass such legislation it may well be determined by the courts that the legislation is inoperative, notwithstanding the declaration by Congress that there is no Federal policy in the way.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I understood the Senator from Minnesota to say that there is decision after decision of the Supreme Court covering that very question. That is the question over which I am skeptical, and I do not want to vote for any provision which I think is unconstitutional.

Mr. PEPPER. As I regard the proposed act of Congress, embodied in the amendment now before the Senate, there is no question respecting its constitutionality, because, as pointed out by the Senator from Florida, it is merely a declaration of the policy of the United States in regard to the taxation of national banks. The purpose of the declaration, if made, is merely to enable the question of validation to be raised in the several States. Without the declaration by Congress, the States are foreclosed from raising the question. With the declaration of Congress, they may raise the question, and whether they raise it effectively and to their own advantage is a question which will then have to be decided by the courts.

I say that some members of the committee, including the Senator from Virginia and myself, do entertain the opinion that when that question is finally decided it will be decided against the validity of the State act, but some of us felt that it was at least fair for Congress to make a declaration of what is undoubtedly the fact, namely, that there is no policy of the Federal Government antagonistic to the retention of these taxes, if they can constitutionally be retained, and it is only to make it possible to raise the question that this amendment has been introduced.

It is true, as pointed out by the Senator from Virginia, that the committee were of the opinion in the first instance that the permanent legislation amending section 5219 ought to be kept separate from this emergency measure, which deals with temporary validation, and therefore the committee were of opinion that two bills should be reported out and not one. But when it was drawn to the attention of the committee that that procedure would keep the validating question out of conference and that without a validating provision annexed there was serious doubt as to our ability to get the permanent legislation through, the committee yielded to the suggestion, and I was authorized by the chairman of the committee, as the member in charge of the measure, to make no objection to the consideration of the amendment as a part of the bill which has been under discussion.

I have made this statement, Mr. President, to clear up the question of fact as to what the action of the committee was and to make plain that those members of the committee like the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] and myself, who are skeptical about the ultimate legislation of the States, may still be in a position of willingness that the question shall be raised and properly decided, which can not be unless this measure is passed by the Congress.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PEPPER] has stated the facts of the case quite clearly and correctly, so far as my knowledge of them extends. I did not know, however, that the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency had authorized a change of the program to the extent of accepting the amendment now proposed by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG]. I was not present at that meeting.

There was one question involved to which no reference has been made in the discussion, so far as I recall, and that was the moral right, the propriety, of the Congress of the United States giving its assent to a proposition which involves the overthrow of a decision already rendered by the courts. The Senator from Minnesota has cited authorities to establish his contention that in the matter of taxation a State may do at a given time what it might have done at some other time but did not do. But I noted, even in one of the authorities cited by the Senator from Minnesota, that the court itself raised the question as to whether this could be done after litigation had already been had and the court's decision rendered.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. KELLOGG. It was done in a case where Congress had failed to authorize a tax, and Congress ratified the tax after judgment had been rendered in the court recovering it. In many cases it is said that the fact that a judgment had been rendered or decision had does not in any way detract from the power of ratification of the tax. The Congress ratified a tariff act after suit had been brought and the money recovered back because there was absolutely no authority originally to levy it. Congress ratified it after it had been paid and after suit had been brought and the money had been recovered back.

Mr. GLASS. Of course, I would not presume to enter into a legal controversy with the Senator from Minnesota or any other lawyer who is contributing to the discussion, because I am not a lawyer. But I again insist that one of the decisions cited by the Senator from Minnesota raised the issue as to whether the taxing power of the State could be used to overthrow the decision of the court already rendered. However, whether it may legally be done or not, I think a moral question is involved as to whether the Congress of the United States should give its assent to a proceeding of that sort by a State if the State concluded to adopt that measure of relief.

Also involved is a question of the escape from all this kind of taxation of the private banks of the various States. I say in equity it would be just as reasonable for the States to pass an ex post facto law, a tax law that would refer back to exact taxation from the private bankers, as it would be to permit the States to retain money illegally collected after the decisions of the court had been rendered. Action of Congress would simply mean assent to a proceeding that would nullify the decisions of the State courts in these tax matters. I doubt very much whether it ought to be done.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, there is just one aspect of the case in which I want to respond to the Senator from Virginia. I do not discuss at all the legal aspect of the situation, because that has been ably presented by the Senator from Minnesota and the Senator from Pennsylvania. With their conclusions I think we may all agree. But the moral aspect of the situation is one that is very appealing to me, and I want to answer what has been said in that behalf by the Senator from Virginia by reading an excerpt from a letter to the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] by the comptroller of the city of New York. I may say that in a letter from the corporation counsel of the city of New York to myself the same facts were stated.

The equities, the moral aspects, of the situation appeal wholly in behalf of the amendment that is presented by the Senator from New York, and any relief that we may afford, anything that we may do to correct a situation that is practically intolerant, ought to be done. Here is what Comptroller Craig, of the city of New York, said in his communication, and I read it upon the aspect that has been suggested by the able Senator from Virginia:

The practical effect of this decision, if the law remains unchanged and the relief can not be had by curative legislation, is that national banks in New York City are exempt from all forms of taxation whatever, except the tax upon the building in which their banking house is located, if the bank happens to be the owner of such building. Such an exemption, coming at a time when under postwar conditions the burden of taxation upon all other classes for National, State, and local purposes is regarded as oppressive, is at least most inequitable and unjust. The national banks in New York City have enjoyed a high degree of prosperity all during the war, as well as subsequent thereto. The city of New York has carried on deposit with the national banks in New York City an average daily balance of approximately $40,000,000, on which it has received but a small rate of interest, usually 2 per cent. I believe I am well within the facts when I say that some of the larger national banks in New York City who have been the beneficiaries of these deposits have loaned money so obtained in markets which have frequently netted them rates of interest from five to ten times as great as that allowed by them to the city of New York. A rule of the clearing house, which includes in its membership all the national banks, precluded the city of New York from obtaining a higher rate of interest upon deposits in National as well as State banks, but no rule of any kind whatever precluded the national banks in New York City from profiteering to the limit of all possibilities with the moneys obtained from the city's deposits.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. The vice of Mr. Craig's statement is that it is totally inaccurate. He refers to all interests being taxed. If all interests had been equally taxed, there would have been no litigation and there would have been no decision such as there was in the New York courts. As a matter of fact, all interests were not taxed. The great private banking corporations of New York were not taxed.

I may say, just in a word, that I am making no plea for the national banks. I am making a plea against Congress or the State legislatures either undertaking by legislative enactment to overthrow the deliberate decisions of the courts. That is what we are proposing to do here.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. CALDER. There is no proposition here to tax the national banks any differently from what we tax the State banks and trust companies and have taxed them for 21 years.

Mr. GLASS. The Senator is entirely mistaken about that. The decision of the New York court was rendered on the basis that the private banker of New York can escape this very tax levied upon national banks and required by the Federal statute.

Mr. CALDER. The Senator from Virginia disputes my statement that the proposition here is to permit the taxing of national banks exactly as we tax State banks and trust companies.

Mr. GLASS. The proposition is to overthrow a decision of the courts of the State of New York to the effect that New York State did not tax private banking capital as it taxed banking capital in national banks.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Senator is in error, because it was the individual of whom he was speaking and not the banks.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President—

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts. Mr. LODGE. I merely wish to say that the condition of affairs in my State is almost precisely the same as the Senator has described in New York. The effect of having no validating legislation would be to leave the banks without any tax whatever for three years. There ought to be some opportunity at least to adjust it, and I think the amendment in its proviso adjusts it very fairly.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is the theory upon which the amendment is offered by the Senator from New York. Baldly put, the proposition is, Shall we, if we can, provide a mode by which a just taxation shall be put upon the banks, or shall we hesitate in affording what remedy is possible to such States as New York, Massachusetts, and others involved, in order that national banks may escape their just and fair share of taxation? Baldly put, that is the question, and I submit it to the Senate.

Mr. GLASS. Baldly put, I contend that is not the question at all. It is not within the power of the Congress of the United States to say what shall be the method of taxation by States. It can only say that whatever method is adopted it shall not discriminate against the agencies of the National Government. That is what it did provide, and New York disregarded the Federal statutes and discriminated against the agencies of the Federal Government by exempting from this very tax the private banking capital. Therefore the decision.

Aside, from that, baldly put, the proposition here is for the Congress of the United States to give its assent to the overthrow of the judicial determination of State courts, and I think that is a very much greater question than the question of returning a few million dollars to the great wealthy State of New York or some other great wealthy State.

Mr. President, I shall not prolong the discussion, because while I have said it may be presumptuous for me to set up my opinion against the opinion of lawyers here, I have no idea on earth that the courts will hold that a State has the right to pass a retroactive law to upset the determination of the courts already rendered.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I am as much opposed as is any other man to undertaking by legislation to discredit or otherwise disturb the decision of a court, but I wish to point out to the Senator from Virginia that the ultimate question of the constitutionality or unconstitutionality of the State law will rest with the court. If it be ultimately determined that this measure is one in which Congress has attempted to declare a right vested by judicial decree to be invalid and inoperative, then the act will be unconstitutional; but if the view of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] shall prevail, that we are merely removing an inhibition upon the State by declaring that there is nothing inimical to the fiscal policy of the Government in the enactment of this legislation, then we shall not be doing anything in despite of the courts or of any judicial decision.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, what the Senator from Pennsylvania has stated is technically true; but, in a great measure, if the State court shall decide, or if ultimately the Federal court shall decide, that the proposed validation is unconstitutional, Congress will occupy the position of having attempted here by legislation to do what the court may say is an unconstitutional act.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have had a great many doubts in my mind as to whether or not it would be proper for me to vote for this validating amendment. I think, however, I shall do so, but I wish it understood, so far as my record hereafter may be concerned, that I vote for the amendment with a great deal of apprehension. I think if the validating amendment shall be adopted and the State of New York shall then undertake to pass a validating act, that, of course, it will be fought in the courts. The question will then be decided upon the act of the legislature of the State of New York; and it is my opinion, when the question comes before the Supreme Court, that the court will hold to be unconstitutional any act of the State legislature to validate the tax collected. That is what I believe as much as I believe that I live, although I am willing to vote to postpone the date of the final decision. If, however, I were an official of New York or of Boston, I would anticipate the payment of the amount of money received by taxation effected by this legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] to the committee amendment.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, before the vote shall be taken on the amendment to the amendment, I wish to get this matter clear in my mind. The court of New York certainly must have decided this question in the light of the facts presented to it. As I understand, the law required that all capital engaged in banking business, if taxed, must be taxed uniformly. It seems as if the court has found that in the State of New York, and perhaps also in the State of Massachusetts, that was not the case, and therefore, as some banking capital, perhaps that of private banks, was not taxed uniformly with the capital of national banks, the national banks were not liable to the tax under the State law. If that be true, then we are attempting here to provide that the rule of uniformity in taxation shall be overturned and to allow the very thing to be done which the court has decided may not be done.

The private banker in lending money necessarily comes in competition with all other banking capital, and especially has he a privilege if he does not pay a tax equal to that of his competitors. The courts have decided that as he did not pay a tax equal to that of his competitors, it was detrimental to the interests of a Government function, namely, the national banks, and that, therefore, such a tax was null and void.

It is not the proposition here to ask New York and Massachusetts to pass acts that are in conformity with the law, but we are now attempting to pass an act to establish a condition which the court has said can not and ought not to be maintained.

The reason I offered the amendment which I have offered was that, if adopted, it would clear up the situation so far as Congress is concerned. The Senator from Minnesota has stated that my amendment, if agreed to, would invalidate the entire legislation, because the State had not imposed the tax in that form on the private bankers in New York; that the State of New York would then have to legislate in order to collect a tax from the private bankers that it had never imposed, and that the amendment, if adopted, would upset the whole plan. On the other hand, however, if we do not provide that private bankers shall be specifically included in the proposed legislation, we shall be ratifying the very act which the court has said should not and shall not be done.

Mr. KELLOGG. The Senator from South Carolina is entirely mistaken as to that.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts is recognized.

Mr. LODGE. I merely wish to say a single word in reply to the statement of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], who, it seems to me, misunderstands the situation. The Senator from Utah spoke about advising the States not to go on and spend the money. There will be no spending of money by the States or the cities under this proposed law. The entire object of the legislation is to get back from the States and from the cities the money for the banks in the amount of $20,000,000 in New York and $12,000,000 in Massachusetts, which would leave the banks untaxed during the past three years. The proviso of this amendment limits the amount the States can recover.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I do not wish to prolong this discussion, but the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] is mistaken in the statement he has made. The Supreme Court of New York has merely decided that the tax was void because it was in violation of an act of Congress which required that national banks shall not be taxed at a greater rate than other moneyed capital in the hands of the individual citizen; and because such capital in the hands of individual citizens was not taxed at the same rate as were banks, therefore it was in violation of the act of Congress.

This proposed law simply consents that the imposition of that tax for three years may be ratified if the State of New York desires to do so. The State of New York may ratify it or part of it or reenact the tax or a part of it, any way it sees fit; that is all there is to it; but Congress must consent to ratify the tax that was levied. We can not name any other condition, for if we do they can not ratify.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill having been read three times, the question is, Shall it pass?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Assistant Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HALE (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] to the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] and vote "yea."

Mr. KELLOGG (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BURSUM] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. LODGE (when his name was called). In the absence of my general pair, the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], I transfer the pair to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. ROBINSON (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND], which I transfer to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] and will vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. COLT. I transfer my general pair with the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] to the junior senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. HARRISON. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS]. I therefore withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. McCUMBER. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING]. I observe that he has not voted, and therefore I withhold my vote, being unable to secure a transfer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MOSES). The present occupant of the chair will announce that he has a general pair with the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD]. He transfers that pair to the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. GOODING] and votes "yea."

Mr. ERNST (after having voted in the affirmative). I transfer my pair with my colleague, the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY], to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. HARRIS] and will let my vote stand.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN]; and

THE CALENDAR.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. LADD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to bring up House bill 8086, Order of Business 963, to prohibit the shipment of filled milk in interstate or foreign commerce.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota asks unanimous consent for the consideration of House bill 8086. Is there objection?

Mr. DIAL and Mr. ROBINSON. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. BALL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of Senate Resolution—

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that we proceed with the calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order is demanded. The Secretary will state the first bill on the calendar.

Mr. SMOOT. The order of the Senate was that we should consider the calendar beginning with Order of Business No. 961.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The order of the Senate made this morning was that the call of the calendar should begin with Order of Business 961, which has been disposed of. Order of Business 963 goes over under objection. The Secretary will state the next bill on the calendar, Order of Business 964.

EXTENSION OF CIVIL SERVICE RETIREMENT ACT.

The bill (S. 4167) to amend an act entitled "An act for the retirement of employees in the classified civil service, and for other purposes," approved May 22, 1920, in order to extend the benefits of said act to certain employees in the Panama Canal Zone, was announced as next in order.

Mr. ROBINSON and Mr. DIAL. Let that go over.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I did not understand clearly what Senator did object, but I hope whoever objected will withhold the objection. This is simply a bill to extend the benefits of the civil service retirement act to the employees of the Panama Canal Zone who are citizens of the United States and whose work is not intermittent but permanent in its character. I have a letter from the Secretary of War in regard to it. He warmly recommends the passage of this measure. I also have a reference to the desire of the Governor of the Panama Canal Zone in regard to it. I hope there will be no objection to the consideration of this bill.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. STERLING. Yes; I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. What is the number of persons affected by the provisions of the bill?

Mr. STERLING. It is ascertained, I think, that there are about 2,100, all told, who will be affected by the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON. What is the increased cost to the Government, as estimated by the committee?

Mr. STERLING. There has been no estimate of the increased cost to the Government, and I hardly know how we could get an estimate.

Mr. ROBINSON. Why was not the original act made applicable to the employees of the Panama Canal Zone?

Mr. STERLING. It did apply to those in the classified service. Such employees as stenographers, typewriters, clerks, and so forth, are already included in the benefits of the retirement act; but there are a number of others in the employ of the Government and in the employ of the railroad, too.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President—

Mr. ROBINSON. Is it proposed by this bill to extend the provisions of the retirement act to persons not within the classified service?

Mr. SMOOT. That is what I wanted to ask the Senator.

Mr. STERLING. To some who are not in the classified service.

Mr. ROBINSON. That would be a very important precedent; and I suggest that the bill go over in order that Senators who are not familiar with it may have an opportunity to look into it.

Mr. STERLING. I want to say to the Senator that under the provisions of the act the President may by Executive order extend the benefits of the act to those who are in the service of the Government.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; but this provides, in effect, for covering them into the service by law, which is very different.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, the bill will be passed over.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator one other question before the bill goes over. If the Senator has not the information at hand as to the meaning of the proviso on page 2, beginning on line 9, I wish he would get from some source the object of that proviso. It reads:

That the inclusion of said employees within the provisions of the civil service retirement act shall not be construed as in any way affecting the regulations which may have been prescribed heretofore or which may hereafter be made applicable to appointments for isthmian service.

I do not know what that means, or what effect it has. It is a new provision in all of our civil service laws, and I hope before the bill comes up the next time the Senator will find out why that provision is incorporated in it.

Mr. ROBINSON. With the Senator's permission, it would seem to me that they would be taken into the service by political influence, covered into the classified service by legislative act, and given the benefit of the retirement provision.

Mr. STERLING. I hope other Senators, too, will take the opportunity to inform themselves in regard to that proviso. I shall, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON. In retort to that remark of my good friend the Senator from South Dakota, I suggest that the Senator in charge of a bill and the Senator who reports the bill ought especially to inform himself respecting its provisions and effect.

Mr. STERLING. I thought this particular proviso was harmless, so far as that is concerned. I did not give it very much study, and I can not now inform the Senator as to the basis of this particular proviso, but I shall take the trouble to inform myself accurately as to what is meant by it.

Mr. ROBINSON. Regular order.

Mr. POMERENE. May I ask one question?

Mr. ROBINSON. I withdraw the request for the regular order.

Mr. POMERENE. Some time ago there were a number of Isthmian Canal employees who were furnished with houses. Is that class of employees included?

Mr. STERLING. I do not think so. There may be some of them who are included in this measure.

Mr. POMERENE. There is another matter I want to ask about, of which I have some personal knowledge. Some time ago there was a movement on foot to enable certain classes of employees to perpetuate themselves in office. For instance, there was some legislation providing for an examining board, and only that class of employees were to be on the examining board. As a result, of course, had that legislation gone through, nobody would have been able to get a position in that branch of the service unless he would pass an examination to be held by that particular board.

Mr. STERLING. Does the Senator from Ohio state that there was some such legislation proposed?

Mr. POMERENE. There was.

Mr. STERLING. I did not know anything about it, and do not know anything about it now.

Mr. POMERENE. It was proposed, and it was called to my attention by one man who thought he had a particular claim on me because he was born in Ohio.

Mr. STERLING. I know nothing of the proposed legislation to which the Senator refers.

Mr. POMERENE. If no one else had made the objection, I would have made it at this particular time, because I think some of those things should be inquired into.

STANDARD AMERICAN DREDGING CO.

The bill (H. R. 5475) for the relief of the Standard American Dredging Co., was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator reporting this bill is not in the Chamber. I wanted to ask him about the amount after reading the report submitted by the Senator. He is not here, and therefore I ask that it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

ESTATE OF JAMES W. MARDIS.

The resolution (S. Res. 397) referring the bill (S. 3652) for the relief of the estate of James W. Mardis to the Court of Claims, was read and agreed to as follows:

Resolved, That the bill (S. 3652) entitled "A bill for the relief of the estate of James W. Mardis," now pending in the Senate, together with all the accompanying papers, be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims in pursuance of the provisions of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911; and the said court shall proceed with the same in accordance with the provisions of such act and report to the Senate in accordance therewith.

LIEUT. HENRY N. FALLON.

The bill (S. 3553) for the relief of the family of Lieut. Henry N. Fallon, retired, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask some member of the Committee on Claims to give an explanation of the bill or else let it go over. Let it go over, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

JOHN N. HALLADAY.

The bill (S. 4028) for the relief of John N. Halladay, was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to credit the account of John N. Halladay, former postmaster at Oak, Ala., with $8,012.13, and to certify said credit to the general accounting office, said sum being a balance due the United States which is chargeable to the embezzlement of funds and theft of money-order forms which were printed for and stolen from the post office at Oak, Ala., and unlawfully uttered in Pensacola, Fla., and Mobile, Ala., by Mr. and Mrs. Leon W. Mendel.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ALMEDA LUCAS.

The bill (S. 3328) for the relief of Almeda Lucas, was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Almeda Lucas, the widow of Preston B. C. Lucas, the sum of $5,000, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, as compensation for the loss of certain lands and buildings in Tillamook County, Oreg., as a result of a resurvey of the homestead of the said Preston B. C. Lucas after the issuance of a final patent.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ESTATE OF THOMAS N. AVERY.

The bill (S. 3988) for the relief of the estate of Thomas N. Avery was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the estate of Thomas N. Avery, deceased, the sum of $2,047.70 in compensation for losses sustained by the explosions at the plant of the T. A. Gillespie Loading Co., Morgan Arsenal, Morgan, N. J., on October 4, 5, and 6, 1918.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, this bill is for the payment of a claim to the estate of Thomas N. Avery for damages caused to certain buildings belonging to the estate when the Morgan ordnance plant, at Morgan, N. J., was destroyed. The Ordnance Department appointed a board to consider and determine the amount of all the claims arising as the result of that disaster. This concern was under the jurisdiction of the Federal courts in bankruptcy proceedings at the time, and therefore no claim was made to the board.

An estimate has been made of the damages to these buildings, the Federal courts having, under a compromise, settled the bankruptcy proceedings, and this claim is to pay for the damages caused by that explosion, amounting to $2,047.70.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BERTHA N. RICH.

The bill (S. 4114) for the relief of Bertha N. Rich was announced as next in order.

Mr. DIAL. I would like to have an explanation of that bill, as to why the Government is liable. It seems to me a very large amount, and this is a very loose way of appropriating money. This kind of a claim ought to go to the Court of Claims, it seems to me.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, this bill provides for the payment of $15,000 to the widow of a man who was killed through the negligence of an Army detachment who were running a recruiting office at the Trenton State Fair in October, 1920.

The First Division of the United States Army were engaged throughout the country in exhibiting a circus at various fairs, and asked for permission to exhibit at the Trenton State Fair. They were accompanied by a recruiting squad, consisting of 34 noncommissioned officers and men, in charge of a first lieutenant. That was auxiliary to the circus squad of the First Division. Arrangements were made with the fair authorities for both these exhibits. The recruiting exhibit included the exhibition of a machine gun, as well as different kinds of ammunition.

On October 2, 1920, the recruiting tent was exhibiting under these officers a machine gun. The first lieutenant in charge of the squad was not present, and the sergeant in charge had left to go to his supper, leaving several noncommissioned officers and privates in charge of the exhibition. Contrary to the rule, although there were no orders issued, there was a belt of live cartridges in the cartridge box of the machine gun, and a large number of loose cartridges lying around. The spectators were going in and out of the tent. The gun that was exhibited had been exhibited at various fairs, and the testimony of the witnesses for the Army shows that it was a defective gun and had fired prematurely at Louisville, Ky.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President—

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I will yield when I have finished my statement. During the absence of the sergeant this gun was exhibited by some men evidently not ordered to exhibit it. The testimony is very hazy as to what happened. There is evidence that private Abe Schwartz was pushed against the gun. There is other evidence from the Army that the gun was operated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from New Jersey may proceed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator is recognized.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The spectators included Mr. and Mrs. Rich, a young married couple, who were looking at the exhibits. While the crank of the machine gun was being turned, the testimony shows that some of the spectators said, "Turn that gun the other way." Suddenly a shot was heard, and Mr. Rich, the husband of the claimant, said, "I am shot." He was shot through the forehead, and died while being taken to the hospital. The evidence shows that a fired cartridge was taken out of the machine gun.

I made a request of the Secretary of War that an investigation be made, a board of officers was appointed by General Summerall, their findings are in the evidence, and they recommended the court-martial of Lieutenant Kutschko and Sergeant Eatherly. The charges were dismissed; the board's findings were disapproved by General Summerall. Mrs. Rich had no means of support. It was shown conclusively that the negligence or the carelessness of the officers was the cause of the death of her husband.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The morning hour having expired, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 12817) to amend and supplement the merchant marine act, 1920, and for other purposes.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I shall be very brief. Secretary Baker, in a communication contained in the report of the committee, stated that he felt that reparation should be made to the young woman, and while I felt that $25,000 was little enough to be paid to her, I submitted to the decision of the committee to make the claim for damages $15,000.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I hope when we call the calendar the next time we may follow the practice of this morning and begin where we leave off to-day. Those of us who have bills near the end of the calendar have waited day after day to get action on some bill. I think it is but fair that when we next consider the calendar and commence the call of bills on the calendar we should begin with the bill that is now before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan ask unanimous consent for that purpose?

Mr. TOWNSEND. No; I do not think it is necessary.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate may proceed with the consideration of bills on the calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; I object. We can not do that to-day. There is an appropriation bill which it is desired to take up, and for that purpose I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. PHIPPS, Mr. BALL, Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, and Mr. DIAL addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado is recognized.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Colorado yield to me for a moment?

Mr. PHIPPS. I will yield in just a moment. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13660) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year 1924.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Had the Senator from New Jersey concluded?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I had not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then the Senator from New Jersey is still entitled to the floor and will proceed.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I simply wish to ask the indulgence of the Senate for the consideration of the bill to which I have been referring, and that it may come to a vote.

Mr. OVERMAN. No, Mr. President; we can not pass it to-day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. OVERMAN. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Very well.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATIONS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS] moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the District of Columbia appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 13660) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. PHIPPS. I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that the bill be read for amendment, and that the committee amendments be first considered.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head "Street and road improvement and repair," on page 24, after line 23, to strike out:

Northwest: For paving Georgia Avenue, Military Road to Dahlia Street, 60 feet wide, $85,000.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the amendment just stated covers an appropriation for the improvement of Georgia Avenue. I would like to have the Senator in charge of the bill explain why the committee struck out the provision.

Mr. PHIPPS. The subcommittee made an inspection of Georgia Avenue in connection with the other avenues and streets. The improvements provided for in the current bill have carried the repaving of that avenue, which is a main thoroughfare, quite a distance toward Walter Reed Hospital. The item placed in the bill by the other House would complete that repaving for about a block and a half beyond the hospital buildings, or, say, to the property line of the hospital. The committee felt that that street could well wait for another year, while residential streets that have been improved on both sides were sadly in need of initial paving. We felt that we could not provide for all of the improvements at this time, and that by eliminating this large item necessary appropriations could be provided for the improvement of three or four other streets where improvements are more needed.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator from Colorado state, in a general way, what is the condition of Georgia Avenue at the point where he has indicated the improvement will be abandoned under the amendment?

Mr. PHIPPS. It is surfaced with asphalt, but it has not been curbed except in patches here and there. The surface, however, is really in fair condition. We traveled over it in both directions by automobile. On that roadway the travel is one way on either side of the car tracks, and it is really not in bad shape at this time. It is an item that will require attention in the near future; but we felt it advisable to postpone it for one year. The same remarks apply to one or two other streets the appropriations for the improvement of which, as the Senator from Arkansas will note, have been stricken out by the Senate committee.

Mr. ROBINSON. Does the statement which the Senator from Colorado has just made apply to lines 6 and 7, on page 25, for paving Canal Road?

Mr. PHIPPS. Yes. Canal Road is in fair condition at the point indicated. It is a 30-foot street, and at least 20 feet of the roadway are available for travel. The repaving there would merely make it a full 30-foot street, with curbing on one side and the sea wall on the other side.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 25, at the end of line 2, to reduce the appropriation for paving Bladensburg Road NE. from end of asphalt northward, 60 feet wide, from "$210,000" to "$110,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

For construction and repair, including the purchase of one special motor vehicle at a cost not to exceed $2,000, including the allowance to the overseer of bridges for the maintenance of an automobile for use in performance of his official duties of not to exceed $26 per month, $30,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 31, line 9, before the name "Key Bridge," to strike out "Francis Scott," so as to read:

Georgetown Bridge, which shall hereafter be known as the Key Bridge, across Potomac River: For miscellaneous supplies and expenses of every kind necessarily incident to the maintenance of the bridge and approaches, $2,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Trees and parkings," on page 31, line 21, after the word "items," to strike out "$50,000" and insert "$60,000," so as to make the paragraph read:

For contingent expenses, including laborers, trimmers, nurserymen, repairmen, teamsters, hire of carts, wagons, or motor trucks, trees, tree boxes, tree stakes, tree straps, tree labels, planting and care of trees on city and suburban streets, care of trees, tree spaces, maintenance of two motor trucks, and miscellaneous items, $60,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head "Collection and disposal of refuse," on page 33, line 20, after the word "vehicles," to insert "or motor vehicles," and in line 23, after the word "vehicle," insert "$26 per month for an automobile, and $13 per month for a motor cycle," so as to make the paragraph read:

For dust prevention, sweeping, and cleaning streets, avenues, alleys, and suburban streets, under the immediate direction of the commissioners, and for cleaning snow and ice from streets, sidewalks, crosswalks, and gutters in the discretion of the commissioners, including services and purchase and maintenance of equipment, rent of storage rooms; maintenance and repairs of stables; hire, purchase and maintenance of horses; hire, purchase, maintenance, and repair of wagons, harness, and other equipment; allowance to inspectors and foremen for maintenance of horses and vehicles or motor vehicles used in the performance of official duties, not to exceed for each inspector or foreman $20 per month for a horse and vehicle, $26 per month for an automobile, and $13 per month for a motor cycle; maintenance and repair of motor-propelled vehicles necessary in cleaning streets and purchase of motor-propelled street-cleaning equipment; purchase, maintenance, and repair of bicycles; and necessary incidental expenses, $400,000.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I should like to know why the words "or motor vehicles" are inserted in line 20, on page 33, in the bill, and what is intended to be done by the insertion of those words?

Mr. PHIPPS. The provision relates primarily to motor vehicles which the District now owns, which have been used in the street-cleaning service for some years past. I take it that it was through inadvertence that the words "or motor vehicles" were omitted from the bill. The motor vehicles have to be maintained, because they are in daily use.

Mr. McKELLAR. How many passenger vehicles are used by inspectors and foremen?

Mr. PHIPPS. We have been furnished with a list, which shows that the number of motor vehicles in the District for which a monthly allowance is made is limited to 45 automobiles and 8 motor cycles. It is the policy of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to dispense with the arrangement as rapidly as possible, however, and to have the District own and maintain its own vehicles where necessary and not to allow them to be used except for official purposes or to be operated after business hours; but where motor vehicles, whether touring cars or Ford cars of the "slip-on" body type, are owned by the individual and used in the District service he is, under the schedule, allowed so much per month for maintenance.

Mr. McKELLAR. In other words, the employee owns his car and the Government furnishes the upkeep and the gasoline for running the car?

Mr. PHIPPS. In part. The figures which we have show that the average cost to the District of upkeep for vehicles of the type for which allowed $26 a month is $35; that is, including repairs of all kinds and the painting, but without regard to depreciation.

Mr. McKELLAR. To how many employees of the District government is $26 a month allowed for the operation of cars?

Mr. PHIPPS. Allowance is made for 45 automobiles and for 8 motor cycles. We have items covering them scattered through the bill, whereas the House sought to put them all in one paragraph.

Mr. McKELLAR. What do those 45 employees do?

Mr. PHIPPS. The Senator's question covers all the departments of the District government; for instance, the building inspection, the surveyor's office, the engineer's department, and so forth.

Mr. McKELLAR. In the building inspection department how many employees own cars that are run at Government expense?

Mr. PHIPPS. In the building division 4 automobiles and 3 motor cycles are used; in the street-cleaning department 16 automobiles and no motor cycles are used; in the electrical department 3 automobiles and no motor cycles are used; in the health department 9 are used.

Mr. McKELLAR. How do the employees of the health department use their automobiles on official business?

Mr. PHIPPS. They are required to cover the entire territory of the District of Columbia; they are compelled to go to all sections of the city in line of duty.

Mr. McKELLAR. In their own cars?

Mr. PHIPPS. I understand that one or two ambulances are included in this number.

Mr. McKELLAR. In the number of eight cars?

Mr. PHIPPS. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. Let me ask the Senator another question. How long has the Senator had those figures? Has he had them for some days?

Mr. PHIPPS. This particular information is dated January 15.

Mr. McKELLAR. There was a resolution passed by the Senate some time ago requiring the District of Columbia authorities to furnish the Senate information in regard to the number of automobiles used by the District government. That information has not been furnished. Does the Senator know of any reason why it should have been furnished to him or other members of the committee and not to be furnished to the Senate by the city authorities?

Mr. PHIPPS. The Senator can readily distinguish between undertaking to make a report on a specific subject such as we have been discussing and making a full report as to all automobiles employed by the District government in its various activities. The information I have relates to automobiles for which allowances are made.

Mr. McKELLAR. Then, when the Senator said that there were 45 automobiles in use by the District, that was not all of them, but merely a part of them.

Mr. PHIPPS. It is not by any means all of them. The District owns, perhaps hundreds of automobiles in use in different activities. Many of them are work cars and some of them are passenger cars; but those to which I have been referring are privately owned cars.

Mr. McKELLAR. How many passenger automobiles does the city own and allow to be used by various employees?

Mr. PHIPPS. I can not furnish the Senator that information offhand; I do not possess it.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator, then, in referring to 45 is merely speaking of the 45 that are owned by employees of the District government, for which the District government furnishes gasoline and repairs and upkeep.

Mr. PHIPPS. Certainly; and that I understood to be the Senator's inquiry.

Mr. McKELLAR. How many horses and vehicles are furnished under this particular allowance?

Mr. PHIPPS. I do not have a complete list of horse-drawn vehicles before me; but the policy has been to dispense with such vehicles except for certain particular classes of work. For instance, in connection with garbage and ash collection experience has demonstrated that the work can be more economically accomplished by the use of horse-drawn vehicles, and therefore such vehicles are being maintained in that department of the service; but, as a rule, where it is desired to move from place to place in the shortest space of time possible the horse-drawn vehicles have been displaced by motor vehicles.

Mr. McKELLAR. Let me see if I understand the Senator correctly. Here is an appropriation of $400,000 for street sweeping and cleaning, and, as I understand the Senator, in connection with that service and the expenditure of that $400,000 there are 45 passenger automobiles used.

Mr. PHIPPS. Oh, no.

Mr. McKELLAR. There are that many used by employees and maintained by the Government. Is that correct or not?

Mr. PHIPPS. The question the Senator directed to me was as to the number of automobiles in this particular activity for which the Government was allowing upkeep. I gave him the number. He then asked me for the total number in the District cared for in the same way, and I read separately the number of such automobiles and motor cycles engaged in various District activities. That does not mean that 45 are utilized in the street-cleaning department at all. I gave the Senator the figures for the street-cleaning department, the number being 16 automobiles and no motor cycles.

Mr. McKELLAR. Here are 16 employees with 16 passenger automobiles engaged in the expenditure of $400,000 in the street-cleaning department. Does not the Senator think that the upkeep of 16 passenger automobiles in the distribution of $400,000, relatively a small sum, is a pretty good overhead charge in that connection?

Mr. PHIPPS. The Senator has confined his attention to the first item under this category of $400,000. If he will pursue his reading of the bill, he will discover an item of $900,000 which belongs to this same department, and that is the garbage-collection item.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, if the Senator will read the provision about the $900,000, he will read this—and allowance to inspectors for maintenance of horses and vehicles or—

Under the amendment of the Senate committee—or motor vehicles used in the performance of official duties, not to exceed for each inspector $20 per month for a horse and vehicle, $26 per month for automobiles, and $13 per month for motor cycles.

There is another appropriation under the $900,000. That is to come out of the $900,000.

Mr. PHIPPS. Yes; but under the two items of $400,000 and $900,000 there is included an allowance for the upkeep of 18 privately owned automobiles.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator whether this is not the fact: There is no existing law under which these inspectors or other employees shall have passenger automobiles in which to ride around the city. There is no law for it. Yesterday I was assured by the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. Smoot] that there was no law providing for any such use of automobiles or the assignment of any such use of automobiles; it depended entirely upon these appropriation bills. Is it not a fact that in these various items there are fixed in an obscure way so many ways of obtaining automobiles and of obtaining the funds for running automobiles that neither the Senator nor anyone else can tell how many automobiles are actually in use by the city government here?

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I can not agree with the Senator that anything is obscure, or that the committee in considering the various items has not had full information and made diligent inquiry as to the expenditures. I have stated the desire of the committee, which is also the desire of the commissioners, to get away from this method of allowing the use of privately owned machines.

Mr. McKELLAR. If that is the purpose, why report a bill that gives a right to use these automobiles just as before, and even enlarges the right? Why does the committee, if it wants to decrease them, offer amendments here, as it does offer them on pages 33 and 34, containing provisions that will increase the use of automobiles?

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me to make a statement, I will make it as concise as possible, but I should like to complete it.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am yielding to the Senator. I hope the Senator will not feel offended if I take a little of my own time.

Mr. PHIPPS. No; but the Senator on at least two occasions has placed a wrong interpretation upon my language for the reason that he did not permit me to complete my statement.

Mr. McKELLAR. All right; I shall be delighted to have the Senator complete it. I want the information.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. PHIPPS. The Senator will find by referring back to the amendment adopted on a previous page that we have stricken out the provision adopted by the House on page 16, which provided for the entire number of automobiles and motor cycles privately owned that would be used in the District service. That meant, if we had permitted the language to rest as it was, that we would have had to have one account on the books of the District to keep track of all this, and then distribute it around among these various activities. The judgment of your committee was that it was better to allocate these motor vehicles to the various activities of the District in their proper place in the bill, following the custom of former years. We have made no amendment other than to split up the House amendment and put it in the separate places where it belongs in the bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. Under the Senator's amendment how many employees of the city government can be paid allowances for running automobiles? That is a perfectly frank question; a perfectly fair question.

Mr. PHIPPS. Yes; and that is the information I have already given the Senator, in that an allowance for 45 automobiles and 8 motor cycles is authorized in this bill. Those are privately owned, and those are the only privately owned vehicles whose maintenance is authorized in the bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is an increase over the House?

Mr. PHIPPS. That is an increase of five over the House, but it is a decrease as compared with the current law.

Mr. McKELLAR. There is not any current law.

Mr. PHIPPS. I speak of the appropriation bill for 1923 as the current law—the present fiscal year.

Mr. McKELLAR. In that sense it might be regarded as current law.

Mr. PHIPPS. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is just a temporary allowance to these officials for the upkeep and the gasoline for automobiles. How long has that been carried on by the District?

Mr. PHIPPS. Several years; I presume almost ever since automobiles came into use.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is just growing a little every year. We are getting a little more and a little more, or a little better and a little better, as Mr. Coué says.

Mr. PHIPPS. No; on the contrary, my own experience since I have been here and have had to do with this bill—and I think this is the fourth bill in which I have had a part—is that it has decreased; it is being kept down; we are cutting down.

Mr. McKELLAR. Then, if that is the Senator's policy, why does the Senator increase the number over that of the House?

Mr. PHIPPS. Because we have found that the House has cut under what they could get along with; that if we should adopt the House figures we would immediately have to appropriate the money to purchase five automobiles. The number of machines on which allowances are made has been decreased and the rate of the allowance has been decreased. Formerly they were allowed $40 a month and $20 a month.

Mr. McKELLAR. How many does the city own? The Senator says that we shall have to purchase some machines if we do not allow the upkeep of these privately owned machines. Does the city have some machines of its own in this service, besides the 45? How many does the city own in this service?

Mr. PHIPPS. That information the Senator will get in reply to his resolution of inquiry, which we all voted for.

Mr. McKELLAR. I should think that before the committee undertook to report here an increase of the 40 or 45 privately owned machines, for the operation of which the Government is to furnish gasoline and oil and all the rest of the upkeep, they ought to know how many are used in this service, and that is what I am asking the Senator—how many are used in this service?

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I can not give the Senator the figures offhand. I desire, however, to call attention to this fact: Where an activity has been established it is carried along with a certain number of vehicles. If the work increases to the point where it can not be carried on with the number already appropriated, then the commissioners come in with a request for an increase, and that request is considered before any additional vehicles are appropriated for. It is not expected that each Senator sitting on the bill will have in mind and will every time call for the information as to how many automobiles are covered.

Mr. McKELLAR. Why should there be a mystery about how many automobiles there are in any particular department? Why ought we not to know how many there are before we spend the people's money for automobiles, and apparently in a very reckless way, without authority of law? Why should we not call upon the city authorities to tell us the number of automobiles that are being used? I should like to know how many employees there are in this department. I am wondering whether every employee in the department has an automobile to carry him around at Government expense.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. CARAWAY. I do not know that the Senator from Colorado would have that information offhand, but what is the use to which five and seven passenger automobiles are put in the city government?

Mr. PHIPPS. Those cars are generally used for taking out a gang of men. Say in surveying, for instance, there will be a crew of four or possibly five surveyors, one man in charge, with his chainmen and others; and they take, of course, their surveying instruments or other things with them.

Mr. CARAWAY. They are rather expensive cars. They look like pleasure cars.

Mr. PHIPPS. Oh, no.

Mr. McKELLAR. And why should they be used at night? Do they survey in the District of Columbia at night?

Mr. PHIPPS. No.

Mr. McKELLAR. I see these large passenger cars running around at night, and I wonder whether they are inspecting houses at night, or surveying the city at night; and if so, what kind of a survey of the city have we.

Mr. PHIPPS. They occasionally would have cases of accident where they might be called on—not surveyors, of course, but certain Government activities—but the Senator and I are in accord in wanting to cut out the privately owned automobiles, and in wanting to keep the automobiles that are in the service of the District in the garages except during business hours, when they are actually working. I want to cooperate with the Senator in that regard.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does not the Senator think that if the Government is furnishing a lot of passenger automobiles for the pleasure of its employees, there ought to be a curtailment of that very unhappy practice?

Mr. PHIPPS. If it is doing so; yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. Has the Senator made any investigation before this bill was reported, adding to the list of automobiles?

Mr. PHIPPS. The point has come up repeatedly, and the commissioners and the other representatives of the District who appeared before our committee have been questioned time and again, and cautioned against the improper use of automobiles, just as the Senator himself, in sitting on the Post Office bill, will question the Postmaster General or his assistants or the supervisor as to the use of automobiles.

Mr. McKELLAR. We generally find out something when we question the Postmaster General or any official of that department.

Mr. PHIPPS. Yes; and if the Senator has the time to read the hearings before the Appropriations Committee, I think he will be satisfied that the details of the bill were very thoroughly inquired into, just as in the case of the Post Office bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am sure the Senator has read them, and I am sure the Senator has taken part in them; and if the Senator will just permit me to ask some questions—

Mr. PHIPPS. I shall be delighted.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to ask the Senator whether each commissioner has an automobile at Government expense?

Mr. PHIPPS. There are three commissioners. Each one is accorded an automobile.

Mr. McKELLAR. Who else in the city government is accorded an automobile at Government expense?

Mr. PHIPPS. The health officer, for one; the chief of police, for another.

Mr. McKELLAR. Are they accorded passenger automobiles, or are they the usual police machines?

Mr. PHIPPS. Many of them are touring cars.

Mr. McKELLAR. Why should the chief of police or an Inspector of police be assigned a seven-passenger touring car?

Mr. PHIPPS. Does the Senator think he should have a limousine?

Mr. McKELLAR. Why should he be accorded a limousine, if he has a limousine?

Mr. PHIPPS. At times it is very useful. There is a limousine that I had the pleasure of riding in the other day on inspection. It belongs to the District. It is allotted to the commissioner, but it is not used by him exclusively. It is at the service of the man in charge of roads and highways, or anyone else, providing the commissioner is not using it.

Mr. McKELLAR. How many of those cars are provided by the city government at Government expense?

Mr. PHIPPS. There are a great number, but they are all under the restrictions of law, which prevent their use excepting for governmental activities.

Mr. McKELLAR. There is no law in the world which restricts their use. There is no law that even authorizes the purchase or the maintenance of an automobile. There is no law whatsoever about it, except what the Senate puts in these various appropriation bills.

Mr. PHIPPS. If I may read to the Senator from page 33, in this very item now being discussed, it is provided, "or motor vehicles used in the performance of official duties." It is clearly limited to those used in the performance of official duties.

Mr. CARAWAY. Does the Senator really think that confines their use to official duties? They could use them 1 day for official duty and 364 days for pleasure; that is, whenever they need them for official duties, they would so use them, but whenever they desire they can take their cooks or anyone else out for an airing.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask the Senator to let this provision go over. Evidently the Senator has a list of some of the automobiles used by the city, and surely, after some two weeks, the city authorities can give us a list of all that are used. I want the Senator to permit that to go over until I can telephone to the Municipal Building and get the list of automobiles. Let us see where we are. The committee evidently does not know how many there are in use in the city, or how they are used, and it does seem to me that the Senate ought to have that information.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I wish again to state to the Senator the method that is customarily followed.

Mr. McKELLAR. I understand the method perfectly.

Mr. WARREN. I rise to a matter of order, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming will state his question of order.

Mr. WARREN. As I understand the rules of the Senate, when a Senator is speaking and another Senator wishes to ask a question or break in, he must address the Chair and ask permission. I know we become remiss in that respect when considering the appropriation bills, but there is no reason why, if we are going to permit running conversation, each Senator should not have a chance to finish answering a question when it is asked, or in putting a question. This running fire, one Senator asking another a question and not waiting until he has a chance to receive an answer, is entirely beyond the rules of the Senate, and I ask for a better observance of the rules.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee was understood by the Chair to have yielded to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. McKELLAR. Absolutely; and I will take pleasure to yield at any time, under any circumstances. There is no use of our getting "hot under the collar" over this matter. I am in perfectly good humor, and I hope Senators will remain in good humor about it. I know this automobile question is rather a ticklish one with many Senators. We are wasting the people's money in granting these appropriations for the use of automobiles here and elsewhere in the so-called use of the Government, but these automobiles are being used, and we all know it—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator suspend for an inquiry? Is the Chair to understand that the Senator refuses to yield further to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no. I suppose, having the floor, I have a right to the floor; but I will yield at any time. I yield to either one of the Senators, or to both.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. WARREN. I do not want to be misunderstood. There is no matter of feeling at all; but in the due course of business the subcommittee reports to the full committee, the committee considers a bill, and then we appear on the floor with the bill. I know it is quite usual for questions to be raised as to bills presented by the committee, and that I take in good part; but when a question is asked of a Senator in charge of a bill, he ought to be allowed to answer it in full as he wishes to do, and when he asks a question in return of another Senator, it seems to me we ought to observe the rule and allow him to finish the question, and then get an answer to it. Nobody is of better nature than my friend the Senator from Tennessee. He is a friend of mine, I hope; I am a friend of his; but in his enthusiasm, by the time the Senator from Colorado answers half of one question, the Senator from Tennessee projects another, until we get very much confused. So I hope we may have a little better order.

Mr. McKELLAR. If I have offended in any way in the world either the Senator from Wyoming or the Senator from Colorado, I had no intention whatsoever of doing so; but I do want to get some information about the automobile question, and I am going to exert every resource of which I am capable in order to get it.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. CARAWAY. In view of the rather gentle lecture from the Senator from Wyoming, who insists that if a Senator asks another a question he must wait until the other answers it, I would like to remark that if the one asked does not happen to have the information, I presume the Senate will have to adjourn until he looks it up, because we can not proceed until the Senator is answered.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have not yet gotten the information I want. I want to know how many automobiles the city government owns and operates, and their cost. I think that when the Appropriations Committee comes in with an amendment increasing the number of privately owned automobiles run at Government expense they ought to be able to give us the facts about them—how many there are in the possession of the city government, what they are being used for, and everything about them. That is what I am asking the Senator from Colorado, who has the matter in charge. He has not been able to give me that information, and in fairness it seems to me that the matter ought to go over until we can get definite information, and I ask the Senator to let it go over.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I am perfectly willing to do that, but before agreeing to that I think it proper that I should explain my position.

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. PHIPPS. There is no feeling whatever on my part, and has not been. I have worked with the Senator from Tennessee so long that I know it is customary for him to interrupt in the middle of a question or an answer, and I am accustomed to it, perhaps more so than my friend from Wyoming.

The question directed to me now is one as to the number of automobiles owned by the city. I have already confessed that I am unable to answer that offhand. The intimation that the committee has been lax in not knowing the actual number in each department before appropriating for them I am willing to pass over. I have answered that by saying that the committees take account of what has been authorized by law, and look into a question when there is a request for an increase. I do not think any committee on which the Senator serves would do otherwise.

As to the number of privately owned automobiles, I have repeatedly stated that there are 45 motor vehicles and 8 motor cycles privately owned for which allowance is provided in this bill. That is not an increase of 5, it is an actual increase of 1 over the amount provided for in the current appropriation law for the year 1923, and that increase of 1 is due to the employment of additional building inspectors.

I am perfectly willing to pass over this item until the Senator gets his information from headquarters. Should he fail to secure that information to-day, I would not like to have that interfere with the final passage of this bill, because this item is an amendment, therefore an item that will have to go to conference; so that the information, if it comes later, will be just as available for the use of the conferees as it would be at the moment.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, if the Senator has concluded his explanation of that item, I want to ask him why the Senate committee increased the amount of the allowance over the figure fixed by the House?

Mr. PHIPPS. The figure recommended by the House Committee on Appropriations was $26 and $13 per month, respectively, as against previous allowances in former bills of $35 and $17.50, and in a still earlier bill of $40 and $20 per month. The House recommendation of $26 and $13 was changed on the floor of the House, on motion, to $20 and $10. Our subcommittee took note of that and called on the commissioners for information as to actual cost of upkeep, and, as I said awhile ago, we found those costs to be $35 and 60 per cent of $20, the cost of the motor cycles. As against $35 and $20 we are allowing $26 and $13, the same as in the law for this year.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator knows that since the passage of the resolution which I offered some months ago to investigate the prices of crude oil and gasoline, gasoline has fallen very greatly, and my information is that it is still falling, and I expect it will continue to fall as long as the Committee on Manufactures continue its present excellent work in that regard. Of course, gasoline is the principal cost of running an automobile, or is one of the principal costs. Why, when the market for gasoline has fallen and is falling so considerably as it is, does the committee fix the same amount for upkeep as was allowed last year?

Mr. PHIPPS. The price of gasoline, according to my information, has fallen but very little.

Mr. McKELLAR. What is the price now?

Mr. PHIPPS. The price to-day is 22 or 23 cents a gallon.

Mr. McKELLAR. It was 29 and 30 cents when that resolution was passed.

Mr. PHIPPS. It was 23 or 24 cents when the present rate of $26 and $13 was established. The present bill is for the coming year, beginning July 1 next. I do not feel that the committee has a right to assume that there is going to be any further reduction of 10 or 20 per cent in the price of gasoline. I hope there may be.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator does not think that as soon as this investigation stops the price of gasoline will go up again?

Mr. PHIPPS. Stranger things have happened. I remember when we paid only 13 or 14 cents a gallon.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator is not basing his usual allowance of this very high price on the theory that as soon as Congress adjourns and the committee stops its investigation the price of gasoline will go up? I am sure he does not mean to do that.

Mr. PHIPPS. I have stated to the Senator the figures of cost that were submitted by the best authority we had at our command—that is, $35 and $20—and as against that we feel that $26 and $13 is low enough to discourage the use of these privately owned automobiles. We want to get rid of them.

Mr. McKELLAR. Has the Senator records showing the names of the employees who are provided for in this amendment; that is, the 45 who own private cars, and the positions they hold in the city government? If so, I would like to put them into the Record.

Mr. PHIPPS. Of course, the committee does not go to that extent in asking information of the commissioners. It deals with positions. I would be pleased to furnish the Senator a copy of the information we have. That gives the divisions but not the names of the individuals and their salaries.

Mr. McKELLAR. I would be glad for the Senator to put that in the Record if he has it. Then I would like to have the names of those employees and the positions they hold. I shall ask the city government to furnish me that information, and I ask unanimous consent at this point to put that in as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STERLING in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent that the document the Senator from Colorado has may also be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
EXECUTIVE OFFICE,
Washington, January 15, 1923.

Hon. LAWRENCE C. PHIPPS,
Chairman Subcommittee on Appropriations, D. C.,
United States Senate.

SIR: Referring to the testimony of the commissioners before your committee on the District appropriation bill, and specifically to the matter of the cost of operation of motor vehicles and motor cycles,

I beg to advise you that an employee granted an allowance for the use of a motor vehicle should have his allowance fixed at $26 per month. Such an employee would run his car on official business at least 700 miles per month, and the actual cost for this mileage would be as follows:

Gasoline.....	$14.50
Oil and grease.....	1.10
Tire and tubes.....	4.00
Battery.....	1.00
Labor and repairs.....	14.40

Total..... 35.00

An employee using a motor cycle in public business should receive an allowance of $13 per month. He would make at least 700 miles per month on official business, and the actual cost of operation for this mileage would be as follows:

Gasoline.....	$7.00
Oil and grease.....	1.90
Tires and tubes.....	2.50
Labor and repairs.....	9.60

Total..... 20.00

Referring specifically to the limitation on allowances to employees for motor vehicles and motor cycles during the fiscal year 1924, as contained on page 17, lines 6 and 7 of the bill now pending before your committee, I would state that the limit as fixed by the House is allowances for not more than 40 persons for automobiles and not more than 8 persons for motor cycles. These figures were fixed by the House committee without consulting with the commissioners, and in order to cover existing allowances it should be changed so as to provide for the fiscal year 1924, that the allowances should be paid to not more than 45 persons for automobiles. The limitation of 8 persons for motor cycles is correct.

There is appended below a table showing the present allowances for automobiles and motor cycles:

	Automobiles, allowance $26 per month.	Motor cycles, allowance $13 per month.
Public schools.....	9
Building division.....	4	3
Plumbing.....		3
Health department.....	9
Water department.....		2
$85 per month.
Purchasing officer.....	1
Board of charities (secretary).....	16
Street cleaning, etc.....	2
Surface division.....	3
Electrical department.....
Total.....	45	8

Very respectfully,

C. KELLER,
Engineer Commissioner.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President—

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JONES of Washington. At page 72 of the House hearings on the bill will probably be found substantially, at any rate, the information the Senator asked for awhile ago as to the number of automobiles owned by the District. This shows the number of cars to be maintained in the municipal garage during the fiscal year 1923, under contingent miscellaneous appropriations, as follows:

Commissioners, 3; assistant commissioners, 3; assessor, 1; Board of Children's Guardians, 2; surveyor, 4; building inspector, 1; city refuse, 3; electrical department, 4; health department, 1; inspector of plumbing, 1; corporation counsel, 1; municipal garage, 7; playgrounds, 1; municipal architect, 1; total, 33; with 1 truck and 10 motor cycles.

I take it that is substantially, though it may not be, all the automobiles owned by the District. They have asked for the purchase of two new ones, as will appear on page 73 of the same hearings. I thought that might give the Senator the information he wanted.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am very much obliged to the Senator for the information. As a matter of fact, there is but one way in which Congress is going to get rid of this drain upon the Treasury, this unauthorized drain, this drain that is little other than acquiescing in graft. That is about the best that can be said of it. Here we have three commissioners and three assistants to the engineer commissioner of the city of Washington, and each one has a touring car kept up at Government expense. That is a very extravagant situation. There is not a city in the country in which the mayor and members of the city council each have an automobile furnished by the city. That is what the three commissioners are; they are members of the city council, and then we have three assistants to a commissioner as well. The idea of giving them each an automobile is little short of willful waste of the people's money. It ought to be stopped. There is but one way to stop it, and that is by publicity. We will not get very much publicity about it in the Washington papers, because they will not publish anything said in reference to extravagance here; that is, it is not their custom to do it, to say the least. But it ought to be known, and so far as I am able to do it I am going to see that it is done. We are going to have facts.

The city government has had ample time to furnish a list of every official who has a machine at Government expense and every employee who has a machine at Government expense. It appears in the list that there are 33 passenger cars now being used by the various employees of the city. Probably the cars cost the city government fully half as much as the salaries of the various employees of the city government, and in addition to that there are 45 employees who own their own cars which are kept up at the expense of the Government. There is no city government in the country that will stand for such a situation as that—such extravagance, such waste. It is little short of graft. The Senator from Colorado ought not to agree to it, and I hope he will not agree to it.

The Senator has stated that he will allow the item to go over, and I shall undertake to get the exact information for which I have asked before a vote is taken upon the amendment. I shall move to strike out the provisions for appropriations for this purpose. At the proper time I shall certainly move to strike out the appropriations by which the commissioners and the assistant commissioners are each given an automobile under the bill.

I find that the surveyor of the city of Washington has four passenger automobiles, according to this list. What can he do with four automobiles? It is impossible to use them all. Of course, he would not have them all unless the Government was paying the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To what provision in the bill does the Senator's request extend?

Mr. McKELLAR. To all that portion which refers to passenger automobiles in the city of Washington. It really begins with something that has already been passed—on page 16 of the House text. The House attempted in some way to limit the matter, and had a certain proviso which I think is good. I ask that the whole matter go over until it can be examined further.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is it understood the matter on page 34 relating to motor vehicles goes over?

Mr. McKELLAR. The matter on pages 33 and 34, and the House provision on page 16, as amended in respect to automobiles only. I am not asking that the rest of it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the amendment on page 16 has been agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am asking unanimous consent that it may go over, notwithstanding it has been agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Tennessee? The Chair hears none, and the matter referred to will go over.

Mr. McKELLAR. May I ask the Senator from Colorado if there are any other provisions in the bill providing for automobiles?

Mr. PHIPPS. Yes. I desire to call the Senator's attention to another clause, in the set-up commencing on page 16 of the bill, which the Senate committee has divided and distributed throughout the bill, and, of course, the same or similar language occurs in several places throughout the bill. It would be my understanding that we would have to consider it all at one time, which is perfectly agreeable.

I would like to call the attention of the Senator from Tennessee to the language on page 18, beginning in line 15, reading:

All of said motor vehicles and all other motor vehicles provided for in this act and all horse-drawn carriages and buggies owned by the District of Columbia shall be used only for purposes directly pertaining to the public services of said District, and shall be under the direction and control of the commissioners.

Mr. McKELLAR. Whenever an employee rides to the office in the morning and drives back home in the afternoon, that is official business. We all understand that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading of the bill will be resumed.

The reading of the bill was continued.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 36, line 15, after the figures "$11,032," to strike out the comma and the words "to be paid wholly out of the revenues of the District of Columbia," so as to read:

In all, for playgrounds, $11,032.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I inquire of the Senator in charge of the bill how the item for playgrounds has heretofore been paid, whether out of the District funds or out of the funds of the Government and the District jointly?

Mr. PHIPPS. I believe it has been paid in different ways at different times. For the present year, 1923, it is being paid out of the revenues of the District of Columbia; but in formulating the law, as the Senator will recall, the 60-40 basis was made a definite plan and can be changed by legislation only and not on an appropriation bill. With that provision was carried the edict that the District revenues, which have heretofore been covered into the District treasury, such as court fines, automobile licenses, and other receipts from privileges, markets, and so forth, instead of going into the District treasury as heretofore, should be covered in 60 per cent to the District and 40 per cent to the Federal Government.

The total amount that has heretofore been paid solely out of the District revenues, to which the Federal Government has not contributed, amounts to $136,000. It covers not only the playgrounds but the community centers, bathing beach, and outdoor sports. The committee felt that, having gone on to a definite 60-40 basis and having taken away from the District a portion of the revenues which it had heretofore enjoyed, there was no good reason for continuing separate items in the bill which should be paid wholly out of the District revenues, except in some cases, perhaps, where it came under a provision of the law.

The community centers, bathing beaches, and playgrounds are used largely by Federal employees. Perhaps it would not be unfair to state that 80 per cent of the use of the bathing beaches and the playgrounds is had by Federal employees who are not taxpayers in the District, and yet in former laws the District has been compelled to pay the entire cost.

Mr. ROBINSON. I am not contesting the major conclusion stated by the Senator from Colorado. I am interested to know how he reaches the conclusion that 80 per cent of the benefits of the playgrounds accrue to Federal employees. I had not understood that Federal employees used the playgrounds.

Mr. PHIPPS. These are not only children's playgrounds. We have tennis courts and other activities which the Government clerks use.

Mr. ROBINSON. I understand that; but I had not understood that 80 per cent of the value of the use of them accrued to Federal employees.

Mr. PHIPPS. I have not any figures upon which to base the statement, but we know how the golf courses and other activities where sports are indulged in are used by the employees of the Federal Government.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator has stated, as I understand him, that the justification for the amendment is that the existing law providing for the distribution of expenses of the District government between the Federal Government and the District of Columbia contemplates that a portion of the expense for playgrounds shall be paid out of Federal moneys rather than wholly out of District funds.

Mr. PHIPPS. I believe that is the way it was provided in the law which was enacted last year; that it is permissive; that there is no definite exception made. The activities which should be paid for entirely by the District of Columbia are not designated in the bill, but the 60-40 plan is set up and provided for except in certain cases, such as Congress may otherwise order in making appropriations.

Mr. ROBINSON. I had not recently examined the statute to which the Senator refers, and I assumed when he made the statement that the Senator had examined it.

Mr. PHIPPS. I have examined it.

Mr. ROBINSON. If the statement is justified by the facts, it would seem to be a good reason for the amendment which the committee proposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment on page 36, line 15, the playgrounds item.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment on page 34, line 16, has nothing to do with automobiles, and therefore will be stated.

The READING CLERK. At the end of the items for collection and disposal of garbage, inspection, and so forth, on page 34, line 16, strike out "$825,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$900,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head "Electrical department," on page 37, line 12, after the word "body," to insert "allowance for the maintenance of not more than three automobiles at not to exceed $26 per month each"; so as to read:

For general supplies, repairs, new batteries and battery supplies, telephone rental and purchase, telephone service charges, wire and cable for extension of telegraph and telephone service, repairs of lines and instruments, purchase of poles, tools, insulators, brackets, pins, hardware, cross arms, ice, record books, stationery, printing, livery, purchase and repair of bicycles, purchase of one 1-ton Ford truck, and one Ford semitruck with "slip on" body, allowance for the maintenance of not more than three automobiles at not to exceed $26 per month each.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask that that amendment go over.

Mr. PHIPPS. Let the amendment go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be passed over.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in the same paragraph, page 37, at the end of line 15, to strike out "$27,500" and insert "$32,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 38, at the end of line 13, to increase the appropriation for purchase, installation, and maintenance of public lamps, lamp-posts, street designations, lanterns, and fixtures of all kinds on streets, avenues, roads, alleys, and public spaces, etc., from "$450,000" to "$472,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 38, line 18, after the word "therewith," to strike out "$20,000" and insert "$35,000"; so as to read:

For replacing gas lamps and fixtures and older and less effective electric lamps and fixtures on streets, avenues, roads, and public spaces by improved electric installations, purchase of posts and fixtures of all kinds, and for all necessary expenses in connection therewith, "$35,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head "Public schools," on page 39, line 13, before the word "assistant," to strike out "two" and insert "three."

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS], who is in charge of the pending bill, if it deals with that burning question which has been so fiercely debated recently as to whether some colored high school should be furnished face powder and lip sticks?

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, the committee has no authentic information on that subject; it has not charged itself with a decision of that question.

Mr. CARAWAY. There is no provision in the bill covering that matter, is there?

Mr. PHIPPS. If it is, it is so concealed that your committee was unable to locate it.

Mr. CARAWAY. I do not see how lip sticks and face powder could be concealed so that the committee could not find them.

Mr. PHIPPS. I appreciate the compliment.

Mr. CARAWAY. If the Senator obtains any information as to that question I wish he would let us know, for I have been somewhat interested in it.

Mr. PHIPPS. I shall be delighted to do so.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, is not the provision for "three assistant superintendents (one of whom shall have charge of business affairs)" new legislation?

Mr. PHIPPS. That item is similar to the item which the Senate approved last year. The committee recommended three assistants, one of whom was to be a business manager, and that recommendation was approved by the Senate but was stricken out in conference.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think the amendment is subject to a point of order, and I make the point of order against it that it is legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Tennessee will not insist on his point of order, as this matter will have to go to conference in any event.

Mr. McKELLAR. I insist upon the point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Moses in the chair). The Chair will hear the Senator from Tennessee on the question of the point of order.

Mr. McKELLAR. There is no law authorizing the proposed legislation. The clause reads:

Three assistant superintendents (one of whom shall have charge of business affairs).

It seems to me to be, and I think there can be no question but that it is, legislation.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I call attention to the fact that this additional place proposed to be provided for here was estimated for by the Budget Bureau, and also that it was reported by a standing committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the Senator from Colorado to state that the position covered by the amendment which is questioned by the Senator from Tennessee was contained in the estimate sent in by the Budget Bureau?

Mr. PHIPPS. It was.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is overruled. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 39, line 14, after the word "superintendents," to insert "(one of whom shall have charge of business affairs)."

Mr. McKELLAR. Is that appropriation also estimated for by the Budget Bureau?

Mr. PHIPPS. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, the Budget Bureau seems to be used for the purpose of increasing appropriations. My recollection is that when our Republican friends secured the establishment of the Budget system the purpose was stated to be to decrease appropriations and to aid us in running the Government more economically; but I notice that in the last two items, as has been frequently the case in other instances, the Budget Bureau is being used on the floor for the purpose of increasing items of expenditure in the various appropriation bills.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Tennessee may find one or two items amounting to but a few thousand dollars which have been increased on the recommendation of the Budget Bureau, but the Budget Bureau has saved many hundred thousand dollars to the Government this year.

Mr. McKELLAR. But the Senator from Utah knows what is said about figures.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from Tennessee that there is not any question about the Budget Bureau having effected great savings in Government expenditures.

Mr. McKELLAR. I hope the Senator from Utah is right about it, but the principal use of the Budget Bureau on the floor has been for the purpose of increasing individual items of appropriations. The Senator from Utah knows that the Budget Bureau has been appealed to quite a number of times for that purpose.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Tennessee can count such instances in this bill, I think, on the fingers of one hand.

Mr. McKELLAR. Thus far we have only reached two such items, but we may find more before we conclude the consideration of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I think that only a few such instances will be found in the pending bill. Such items are very small and really do not amount to anything in the way of dollars and cents. The Budget Bureau has been the means of increasing appropriations a few cents here and there, but it has reduced appropriations in other cases by millions of dollars.

Mr. McKELLAR. We hope so, but I have never as yet seen the figures which I have thought were reliable about the matter. I hope, however, the Senator from Utah is right about it. We are going to give the Budget system a fair trial, and I hope the Senator and his party will not use the Budget so often for the purpose of increasing appropriations of the people's money.

Mr. SMOOT. If there is any committee in this body or in the other which has watched the expenditures of the Senate more carefully than the one having charge of the pending bill I do not know where it is, and I have been here now for 20 years.

Mr. McKELLAR. There are increases all through this bill. The Senator from Utah knows that we are increasing the appropriations right along.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think there is an increase in the pending bill over the existing law.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am not sufficiently familiar with that matter to say positively, but I think the Senator from Utah is mistaken. At any rate, the amendments which are brought in by the committee so far as we have yet come to them all provide for increases.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 39, at the end of line 23, to strike out "$73,620" and insert "$77,370," so as to make the paragraph read:

Salaries: Superintendent, $6,000; 3 assistant superintendents (one of whom shall have charge of business affairs), at $3,750 each; director of intermediate instruction, 13 supervising principals, supervisor of manual training, and director of primary instruction, 16 in all, at a minimum salary of $2,400 each; secretary, $2,000; financial clerk, $2,000; clerks—1 $1,600, 2 at $1,500 each, 2 at $1,400 each, 3 at $1,200 each, 4 at $1,000 each (one of whom to carry out the provisions of the child labor law); 2 stenographers, at $1,000 each; messenger, $720; in all, $77,370.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Teachers," on page 42, line 18, after the word "including," to insert "administrative principals," so as to read:

Class 5, 233, at $1,200 each, including administrative principals, vocational trade instructors, and teachers of Americanization work.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 44, line 24, after the word "work," to insert "administrative principals of elementary schools," so as to read:

For longevity pay for director of intermediate instruction, supervising principals, supervisor and assistant supervisor of manual training, principals of normal, high, manual-training high, and junior high schools, the assistant principals of the Central and McKinley Manual Training High Schools, the assistant principals (who shall be deans of girls) of the Central, Eastern, and Dunbar High Schools, principals of grade manual-training schools, heads of departments, director and assistant director of primary instruction, directors and assistant directors of drawing, physical culture, music, domestic science, domestic art, kindergartens, and penmanship, principal and teachers in Americanization work, administrative principals of elementary schools, teachers, clerks, librarians and clerks, and librarians to be paid in strict conformity with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to fix and regulate the salaries of teachers, school officers, and other employees of the Board of Education of the District of Columbia," approved June 20, 1906, as amended by the acts approved May 28, 1908, May 18, 1910, and June 28, 1912, $620,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 45, line 18, to strike out "$40,000" and insert "$25,000," so as to make the paragraph read:

For allowance to principals of grade school buildings for services rendered as such, in addition to their grade salary, to be paid in strict conformity with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to fix and regulate the salaries of teachers, school officers, and other employees of the Board of Education of the District of Columbia," approved June 20, 1906, $25,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Community center department," on page 47, line 12, after the figures "$35,000," to strike out the comma and the words "to be paid wholly out of the revenues of the District of Columbia," so as to read:

For salaries of directors, supervisors, teachers, clerks, and other employees for civic, educational, recreational, and social activities under the direction of the board of education; for payment of janitor service; for equipment and supplies; for lighting fixtures; for maintenance of automobiles (employees of the day schools may also be employees of the community center department); in all, $35,000: Provided, That not more than 70 per cent of this sum shall be expended for salaries of directors, supervisors, teachers, clerks, and janitors.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Hygiene and sanitation," on page 48, line 15, before the word "exercise," to strike out "give his whole time to, and" so as to make the paragraph read:

Salaries: Chief medical and sanitary inspector, who shall, under the direction of the health officer of the District of Columbia, exercise the direction and control of the medical inspection and sanitary conditions of the public schools of the District of Columbia, $2,500; 16 medical inspectors of public schools, 1 of whom shall be a woman, 4 shall be dentists, and 4 shall be of the colored race, at $500 each; in all, $10,500.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I should like to have an explanation from the Senator in charge of the bill as to that amendment. Why should not the chief medical and sanitary inspector of the District give his whole time to the duties of his office?

Mr. PHIPPS. He should do so, and does within legal hours.

Mr. McKELLAR. Why, then, should the words be stricken out?

Mr. PHIPPS. The Senator, no doubt, gives his full time to his senatorial duties, but he is not precluded from looking after his personal and private affairs after he leaves his office.

Mr. McKELLAR. The law now requires this officer to give his whole time to the duties of his office.

Mr. PHIPPS. It does.

Mr. McKELLAR. Then, why is not the amendment subject to a point of order? It has not been estimated for by the Budget Bureau.

Mr. PHIPPS. He is the chief medical and sanitary inspector of the public schools—

Mr. McKELLAR. I understand that.

Mr. PHIPPS. And the amendment merely provides that he shall not be required to give his whole time to "the direction and control of the medical inspection and sanitary conditions of the public schools."

Mr. McKELLAR. I am wondering how such a provision can be defended. The amendment is legislation. The present law requires the officer to give his whole time to the work, and the amendment is designed to excuse him from that requirement of the law.

Mr. PHIPPS. Not at all. It does not change the law. The words proposed to be eliminated are merely surplusage.

Mr. McKELLAR. If it does not change the law, why is the amendment proposed? I make the point of order against the amendment on line 15, page 48.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What is the point of order?

Mr. McKELLAR. That it is legislation and changes the existing law.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I merely wish to suggest that the amendment merely proposes to strike out certain words incorporated in the bill by the other House.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; and, if the House had not entered the field, of course the Senator's point of order would be well taken; but the amendment simply proposes to strike out words that were in the House bill so that it can not be subject to the point of order.

Mr. McKELLAR. But the amendment is proposed by the Senate committee.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; but as the words were in the House bill of course the point of order can not apply.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is general legislation on an appropriation bill. If there is any technical way of getting around it, I suppose that it will be availed of. Senators, however, can not rely on the Budget Bureau as they did awhile ago, because it is not such a matter as could be estimated for the Budget. So resort to the Budget estimate fails, and now it is suggested that the amendment is not subject to the point of order because the words proposed to be stricken out were adopted by the House. The House, however, did not adopt the amendment now under consideration because the Senate committee has changed the wording of the House bill. However, I submit the question to the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator state exactly the point of order which he makes against the amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. That it is general legislation on an appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is overruled. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was on page 49, line 14, to increase the appropriation for transportation for pupils attending schools for tubercular children, from "$2,000" to "$3,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 50, line 11, after the word "for," to insert "including an allowance of not exceeding $312 per annum for a motor vehicle for each the superintendent of schools, the superintendent of janitors, the two assistant superintendents, the director of primary instruction, the school cabinetmaker, the supervising principal in charge of the white special schools, the chief medical and sanitary inspector of schools, and the supervising principal of the colored special schools, and" so as to make the paragraph read:

For contingent expenses, including furniture and repairs of same, pay of cabinetmaker at $1,200 per annum, stationery, printing, ice, and other necessary items not otherwise provided for, including an allowance of not exceeding $312 per annum for a motor vehicle for each the superintendent of schools, the superintendent of janitors, the two assistant superintendents, the director of primary instruction, the school cabinetmaker, the supervising principal in charge of the white special schools, the chief medical and sanitary inspector of schools, and the supervising principal of the colored special schools, and including not exceeding $3,000 for books of reference and periodicals, $79,200.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I want to take enough time to call attention to the legislation about automobiles on this page. The automobiles referred to are privately owned, I presume. I will ask the Senator in charge of the bill if that is not so?

Mr. PHIPPS. It is my understanding that they are privately owned automobiles; yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. Is there any doubt about it in the Senator's mind.

Mr. PHIPPS. No; not the slightest.

Mr. McKELLAR. Very well. The amendment proposes to insert the words—including an allowance of not exceeding $312 per annum for a motor vehicle for each the superintendent of schools, the superintendent of janitors, the two assistant superintendents—

I presume that means the two assistant superintendents of janitors.

Mr. PHIPPS. No.

Mr. McKELLAR. Well, what are they assistant superintendents of?

Mr. PHIPPS. Assistant superintendents of schools, one white and one colored.

Mr. McKELLAR. How many assistant superintendents of schools are there?

Mr. PHIPPS. There have been two, but the bill now provides for one additional.

Mr. McKELLAR. That makes three; so that the superintendent of schools and each assistant superintendent of schools have automobiles run at the expense of the Government; and then the superintendent of janitors has an automobile that is run at the expense of the Government; and then the amendment provides that the director of primary instruction shall have an automobile run at the expense of the Government, and the school cabinetmaker shall likewise be provided for. What does he do?

Mr. PHIPPS. He goes from school to school and mends chairs and repairs furniture. By allowing $312 for the automobile a year the District is saved two or three times that amount at least.

Mr. McKELLAR. There is a saving in his time, at any rate, and of course his time is very valuable. He has to go very rapidly from one school to another to repair a chair here and a chair there, and so, of course, I can understand why the cabinetmaker should be provided with an automobile.

Mr. PHIPPS. The alternative would be to send a chair or a desk to a cabinetmaker, and we would have transportation both ways and the bill of the cabinetmaker, which would be several times the amount involved when the work is done in this way.

Mr. McKELLAR. To show the ludicrousness of it, Senators and Congressman who have to visit the various departments every day of their lives, if they do what their constituents want them to do, at any rate—and most of them do—are not furnished automobiles or furnished the upkeep and gasoline and other means of operation of automobiles; and yet we find here in this amendment, which I think is clearly subject to a point of order—and I am going to make it a little later—a motor passenger car provided for each of the superintendents of schools and the superintendent of janitors and the two assistant superintendents. They may be assistant superintendents of schools, as the Senator says, or they may be assistant superintendents of janitors; I do not know, and the language itself does not tell.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. Just one moment. The director of primary instruction, the school cabinetmaker, the supervising principal in charge of the white special schools, the chief medical and sanitary inspector of schools, and the supervising principal of the colored special schools have passenger automobiles furnished them by the city government. It does seem to me that we have carried this system of furnishing cars for employees of the Government to an extent that no man can possibly defend. I do not see how the committee can defend this wholesale granting of automobiles—

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President—

Mr. McKELLAR. Just one moment.

Mr. PHIPPS. The Senator promised to yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will yield in a moment.

Mr. PHIPPS. I only want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that he is talking about an item that we have agreed to carry over until certain information can be obtained.

Mr. McKELLAR. Why, of course, I know that.

Mr. PHIPPS. These are part of the 45.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course, I understand exactly what we have done; but I am calling the attention of the Senate now to this amendment which gives to these employees of the Government the money for the upkeep and operation of their privately owned machines in the city of Washington. I have been calling this temporary legalized graft. I think we have investigated it now to the point where we can call it just plain graft. That is all there is in it. The idea of furnishing automobiles and furnishing the means of keeping up and maintaining and operating machines for all these employees of the Government in the city of Washington is little short of a legislative outrage.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I am through.

Mr. PHIPPS. I just wanted to ask the Senator, if he were the superintendent of schools, if he would not expect to visit the different schools in the District from time to time, and, in fact, daily, to know what was going on, so that he might keep himself informed; and if so, how would he travel? Would he patronize the street cars or would he walk?

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from Tennessee would perform his duties as assistant superintendent or superintendent, as the case might be, just as he performs his duties as a Senator. He gets a taxi or he rides on the street car or he walks, and pays for it himself; and that is what these petty officers of the Government should do. It is astonishing to me that the Appropriations Committee will offer here amendments of this kind; and at this time I make a point of order against all of these amendments, because they are legislation on an appropriation bill for which there is no warrant of law.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, the Senator again forgot his promise to allow me time in which to complete a statement, and that was this: If the Senator did travel from place to place and visit these schools, if he did it at his own expense, and furnished the automobile or hired the taxis, he would expect his compensation to be increased accordingly so as to cover that expense. Now, it is a question whether it is wiser to allow $312 a year for them to use their own cars or to allow them enough additional salary to pay for their taxicabs, and in my judgment it would exceed the $312 allowance. It would involve an increase of at least $500 a year in each one of these salaries.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN in the chair). The Chair overrules the Senator's point of order, on the ground that it is an amendment reported by a standing committee.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Colorado, if these cars are so necessary, why did not his committee report in favor of giving each of these officials or employees an automobile? The committee seems to have given mighty nearly everybody else connected with the city government an automobile. Why not give it to these men? Why require them to buy their own automobiles at their own expense? Of course it is very nice of the Government to contribute to their operation and upkeep, but why not let the city furnish automobiles for each of them?

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, if the Senator has finished his question, my reply is that the Senator can perhaps bring about that result by going before the Bureau of the Budget and having the automobiles properly estimated for, but the committee could not consider giving these officials new automobiles in lieu of travel allowance without a properly estimated allowance, passed upon and approved by the Budget, and it is not produced. The committee did not have such a Budget item for consideration.

Mr. McKELLAR. Did the Budget approve this?

Mr. PHIPPS. The Budget approved the allowance for the upkeep of automobiles, but presented no item for the purchase of new automobiles.

Mr. McKELLAR. Then I think the committee is to be complimented to that extent, anyhow, that they did not disregard the Budget and furnish the money to pay for automobiles for all of these employees. I think the committee is to be very highly complimented for not giving automobiles to all these gentlemen and all these superintendents and all these assistant superintendents and cabinetmakers. Why, every cabinetmaker working for the city of Washington ought to have an automobile, and the committee no doubt has performed a good service in saving the expense of actually turning over an automobile to these various employees of the Government.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Chair understand that the Senator in charge of the bill has consented to have this item go over?

Mr. PHIPPS. I have.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the next amendment of the committee.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I understood that the point of order was overruled by the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It was.

Mr. HARRISON. I wanted to address myself to that proposition. I am not so much interested in the controversy between the Senator from Colorado and the Senator from Tennessee with respect to these automobiles, except in this respect: I think it would be much better to make an increased allowance to the respective officers of the schools, so that they could pay out of it any fares that they have to pay in order to travel from one school to the other, because the trouble in providing automobiles is that they use them a great deal for their own private use, and so on, and it is a habit that has grown up here as well as a custom that should be stopped. I think that these persons who have to travel from school to school should be provided by the Government with funds enough to do it, and that their salaries should be increased accordingly; and I should much prefer to see that than to see them given automobiles by the Government so that they can ride around with their families, and so forth.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that the trouble with that is this: If we increased the salary now, instead of using the increase for maintaining an automobile they would still want to have an automobile furnished to them; and not only that, but the employees in the other departments of the Government would immediately point to the salaries paid to these individuals and want their own salaries increased. So if we are going to give them any kind of an automobile, I think the plan here is very much better than to furnish them an automobile and have the Government pay the expense of it, because, if it is done in that way, it will cost a great deal more than $312 a year, as the Senator from Tennessee quoted the figures on yesterday in this discussion.

Mr. McKELLAR. We may as well do it right if we are going to do it at all. Why not let us equip every employee of the city government with an automobile, and furnish a chauffeur for him, and gasoline, and all the expense of upkeep, and get him a new one about once a year?

Mr. SMOOT. No; I will say to the Senator that I would rather limit the ones to whom we are already giving automobiles. I think we shall have to work out some kind of a plan, and I am going to try to work it out between now and next year to regulate this whole automobile business, because I know as well as the Senator from Tennessee knows that it is abused, and has been abused ever since the first automobile was granted to an employee of the Government.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the Senator a question? I want to get the construction that the committee places upon this amendment. It is proposed here to give to each one of these parties $312.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. And out of that $312 they can spend what is required for fares and traveling from one place to another, can they?

Mr. SMOOT. No; they use their own automobiles, and have the wear and tear of them, and furnish their gasoline, and make all of their repairs.

Mr. HARRISON. If they want to buy a Ford automobile, or what not, they can do it; but the Government gives them $312 a year?

Mr. SMOOT. That is right.

Mr. HARRISON. If they spend only $150 a year, they make the difference between the two?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; and if they spend $600 they lose the difference.

Mr. HARRISON. And the superintendent here estimated, as well as other parties, that $312 was about the right figure? Is that the idea?

Mr. SMOOT. I think that is about the right figure on a car of ordinary cost for the first three or four years. After that the repairs will be more than that.

Mr. HARRISON. I had gathered the impression that we were furnishing an automobile to each of these parties. I like this plan much better than the other; but there is more to it than that. A point of order was made and the Chair overruled the point of order. I suppose, in overruling the point of order, the Chair assumed that the Director of the Budget had made his estimate specifically for these sums. If he had, of course, that may be all right; but may I ask the Senator from Colorado whether the Budget Bureau estimated for this?

Mr. PHIPPS. It did, yes; and it was reported by the House; but before the Senator came in that item was explained. The House had the entire lot of automobiles and motor cycles permissible under that heading grouped in one place. The Senate committee found it advisable to separate them, and put them in the different parts of the bill where they properly belong.

Mr. HARRISON. I think the Chair is eminently correct. I did not know that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will continue the reading of the bill.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 52, at the end of line 2, to strike out "$4,500" and insert "$6,000," so as to make the paragraph read:

For purchase of apparatus, fixtures, specimens, technical books, and for extending the equipment and for the maintenance of laboratories of the departments of physics, chemistry, biology, and general science in the several high and junior high schools and normal schools, and for the installation of the same, $6,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 52, line 8, after the word "Navy," to insert "and children of other employees of the United States stationed outside the District of Columbia," so as to make the paragraph read:

The children of officers and men of the United States Army and Navy and children of other employees of the United States stationed outside the District of Columbia shall be admitted to the public schools without payment of tuition.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I ask why this change is made in the language?

Mr. PHIPPS. We restored the language of the appropriation bill of 1923.

Mr. HARRISON. That is carrying out the purposes of that law, then?

Mr. PHIPPS. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the subhead "Buildings and grounds," on page 52, line 19, after the word "contract," to insert "or contracts," so as to read:

For beginning the remodeling of and the construction of an addition to the Western High School, to provide a new assembly hall, a gymnasium for boys, a gymnasium for girls, and additional classrooms, $100,000, and the commissioners are hereby authorized to enter into a contract or contracts for said remodeling and extension at a cost not to exceed $550,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 53, line 6, after the word "land," to strike out "adjacent to" and insert "in the vicinity of," so as to read:

For the purchase of additional land in the vicinity of the Slater-Langston (Cook) Schools, $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 53, line 14, after the word "fund," to strike out the semicolon and the following provisos:

Provided, That none of the money appropriated by this act shall be paid or obligated toward the construction of or addition to any building the whole and entire construction of which shall not have been awarded in one or a single contract separate and apart from any other contract, project, or undertaking, to the lowest bidder complying with all the legal requirements as to a deposit of money or the execution of a bond, or both, for the faithful performance of the contract: Provided further, That no architect's fee shall be paid or obligated for plans, specifications or any professional services whatever, unless they are such as will enable the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, or those letting a contract, to secure a legal bid within the amount authorized by Congress for the building or other project: Provided further, That nothing herein shall be construed as repealing existing law giving the commissioners the right to reject all bids.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I have had no opportunity of studying that amendment, but I should like to have the Senator in charge of the bill make an explanation of it. The language stricken out here seems to constitute a limitation on the use of the funds appropriated. What is the basis for the controversy involved in the provision stricken out?

Mr. PHIPPS. The appropriation bill of 1923, as it came from the House, had similar language in it, which was stricken out by the Senate. When the bill went to conference it was found that the House conferees were insistent upon that proviso. The representatives of the Senate reluctantly consented to adopt their language as a try out to see how it would work.

Mr. ROBINSON. Then, it is the language of the present law?

Mr. PHIPPS. This language proposed to be stricken out is the language of the present law, but we decided to strike it out because the Senate committee is not convinced that it is a proper proviso. We think it undoubtedly restricts the commissioners in entering into contracts, and therefore the contracts they make are at times less favorable than they would otherwise be.

Mr. ROBINSON. The language seems to include a number of limitations or restrictions. In the first place, it prevents the use of any of the funds appropriated for the construction of a building, or any addition to a building, the whole and entire construction of which shall not have been awarded in a single contract separate from any other contract, project, or undertaking. I presume the object of that restriction was to make it appear on the face of the statute and of the proceedings under it just what amount is being expended for a particular building.

Mr. PHIPPS. True, but the practical working out is this: The general contractor has to be entrusted with the installation of the heating appliances, the electric wiring, and other special work, which can better be left direct to the specialists who produce those things; and by putting it into the general contract, we not only have to pay the ordinary profit to the heating contractor or the electrical man but we have to pay the general contractor's profit on top of it.

Mr. ROBINSON. What is the practice of the commissioners with respect to the letting of these contracts? Do they uniformly or usually let them to the lowest bidder?

Mr. PHIPPS. Usually, I should say. There has been only one exception I know of in the past four years, and that was a justifiable exception, in that the difference between the lowest bidder and the next highest was a very small amount, less than a quarter of 1 per cent of the contract price; but time was a consideration, and the second highest bidder offered to and did, as a matter of fact, complete the building in 60 days less time than the lowest bidder had been willing to contract for; so that the commissioners in that one instance only, to my knowledge, exercised their authority to reject the lowest bid.

Mr. ROBINSON. The experience of the commissioners has shown that the provision requiring the construction of a building to be let under a single contract has caused an increase in the cost of building as a whole. I believe the Senator has made that statement.

Mr. PHIPPS. I would not like to put the commissioners on record as having made that statement. That is my belief, and it is my impression, from talking with the commissioners and the architect; but I have had no direct statement to that effect.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not want to take any position which would unduly bind the commissioners or impair the activities of the commissioners in the construction of these buildings, but on its face the restriction appears to be a wholesome one in many of its provisions. For instance, I notice, in addition to the two provisions already discussed, there is a requirement as to the execution of a bond for the performance of the contract.

Mr. PHIPPS. That is always required.

Mr. SMOOT. That is always required, and even before there was any law the District required that.

Mr. ROBINSON. There is no objection, then, to that requirement?

Mr. SMOOT. None whatever.

Mr. ROBINSON. May I ask either the Senator from Colorado or the Senator from Utah whether the committee gave thought to modifying the provision so as to retain the requirements which are admittedly justified? For instance, if the Congress strikes out the provision requiring the execution of a bond by the contractor, the commissioners might take the view of the matter that that was an invitation to proceed in another way.

Mr. SMOOT. I hardly think so, because it has been the practice ever since there was a commission.

Mr. ROBINSON. It is now the law; and if you change the law it might be regarded by the commission as an expression of an opinion on the part of Congress that the contrary course should be taken; certainly it would leave the commissioners free to enter into a contract without a bond. What objection can there be to requiring the execution of a bond if it is right and proper to have that precaution taken?

Mr. PHIPPS. That would not be the result. The commissioners are required under the law to have a bond executed, and they do so in all cases. The language used in this proposed proviso necessarily couples up the fact that this must not be construed as relieving them from the requirement of a bond. If we eliminate the proviso, it disappears, and the law still remains that the contractor to whom a contract is awarded must furnish a bond.

Mr. ROBINSON. A statute separate and apart from this provision requires the execution of a bond?

Mr. PHIPPS. That is correct.

Mr. ROBINSON. That would seem to be an answer to my inquiry, and I thank the Senator for the explanation.

What is the meaning and effect of the next proviso?

That no architect's fee shall be paid or obligated for plans, specifications, or any professional services whatever, unless they are such as will enable the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, or those letting a contract, to secure a legal bid within the amount authorized by Congress for the building or other project.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, the committee feels that that is unnecessary, because it has insisted and the commissioners insist that all plans and specifications be drawn by the municipal architect, or under his supervision, and there are no contracts let to outside architects for the preparation of plans. This is an unnecessary provision. It is surplusage, and would have no effect.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is, provided the commission continues its present method of procedure. If this provision were eliminated, would there be anything in the law to prevent the commissioners, if they chose to do so, from allowing fees to outside architects?

Mr. PHIPPS. There is provision in the law.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is already in the law?

Mr. PHIPPS. It is already in the law. This is surplusage.

Mr. ROBINSON. If that is the case it is really not necessary.

Mr. SMOOT. The substance of the whole thing is the first provision, that there should be one single contract. I think the Senator has had experience enough himself in building to know it is very unwise to build in that way. I think it should be so arranged that bids can be asked from painters and bricklayers and carpenters, and for all the furnishings, and the lowest bids taken, the whole contract made in conformity with the lowest bids in all cases, and not take one contractor's bid for the whole thing.

Mr. ROBINSON. The practical experience of the Senator from Arkansas would not be of any very great value in determining a question of this nature; but I can see that there is force in the suggestions made that the probable effect of such a restriction would be to increase the cost of construction as a whole rather than to reduce it, and so far as I am concerned I am going to follow the conclusion of the committee.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I desire to offer several amendments. I request that they may be read for information and lie on the table until we come to them in regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Moses in the chair). The Secretary will read as requested.

The reading clerk read as follows:

On page 68, in line 4, after the word "officers," insert: "Director, probation department, $2,400."

On line 6, after the figures "$1,500," insert: "Case supervisor, at $1,880; 2 probation officers, at $1,400 each."

In line 10, after the figures "$1,200," insert: "Stenographer at $1,200."

The next amendment of the committee was, on page 54, line 11, to strike out "$250,000" and to insert in lieu thereof "$300,000," so as to read:

For repairs and improvements to school buildings and grounds and for repairing and renewing heating, plumbing, and ventilating apparatus, and installation of sanitary drinking fountains in buildings not supplied with same, $300,000.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I would like to inquire of the Senator from Colorado, having the bill in charge, whether in the items recommended for school buildings the committee had in view the fact that a committee of the House and Senate have conducted a rather exhaustive investigation with a view to determining the mechanical needs of the school system—that is, the necessary schoolhouses, and so forth—as well as the character of legislation needed to give to the District an efficient and proper educational system? What I want to know is whether or not the committee availed itself of any of the findings of that committee or whether in their recommendations for school buildings they have made provision only for those which could be completed quickly, which seem to be indispensably necessary.

Mr. PHIPPS. I assume the Senator refers to the committee of 1920, headed by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], of which he, together with the Senator from Mississippi, was a member?

Mr. KING. There is a joint committee of the House and Senate, of which the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER] is chairman, and Mr. WALTERS, Representative from Pennsylvania, is vice chairman. They have been taking testimony, and have had before their committee educators of the highest standing throughout the United States, and have canvassed the question as to the kind of buildings which should be required, the curriculum which should be established, and, generally, the entire educational system of the District. That committee, I hope, will be able to report before we adjourn, and I think the committee will recommend a program of school building which will call for perhaps $6,000,000 to $10,000,000. I was wondering whether the committee preparing this bill attempted to deal with that progressive program or provided only for buildings which they deemed to be imperatively needed now.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, as the Senator is well aware, we have not caught up with our delinquencies due to the World War and the aftermath, and all we have put in this bill does not enable us to get up within two years of where we should be in a comprehensive building program. The committee has given careful study to the various locations for the proposed new buildings incorporated in this bill and visited them in person. We have made some additions, and recommended some rather large items of money expenditure over the recommendations of the House, looking to further expansion and the necessities of the future in the rapidly growing communities. The Senator will find those items in the printed amendment, to which I called his attention on Saturday last, and he is familiar with them, no doubt. I feel sure, speaking for the committee, that not one single item of appropriation for the acquisition of property as a building site or the erection of a building will be found not to fit in with any program that a committee such as the Senator refers to will present to the Senate. We would like very much to have the benefit of that investigation and that report, certainly before we take up the consideration of next year's bill, and if it is available now—and regarding that I have not been informed, although I am familiar with the Dillingham report—if we should come into conference with the House on any of these items, we would be glad to avail ourselves of that information.

Mr. KING. Let me say to the Senator that owing to press of other official duties I have had no opportunity to examine the bill or the amendments which the Senator was kind enough to place upon my desk on Saturday last.

I only want to say that the committee, after a very full examination and after having visited the schoolhouses of the District, reached the conclusion that many of the buildings were archaic and needed either complete demolition or complete rehabilitation, and that a large number of improvements were needed immediately in the school buildings of the District; further, that a broad and comprehensive plan should be adopted for the construction of a number of buildings in various parts of the city that would meet the demands not only of the present but the demands of the city as we believe it will expand during the next 10 or 15 years. I think that program will call for a very large appropriation, as I said, perhaps $6,000,000 to $10,000,000.

There is no doubt but what a considerable sum is needed immediately for the improvement of school buildings and for the erection of other school buildings. I sincerely hope that the committee, of which I happen to be a member, will be able to report before adjournment, and hand to those who are dealing with appropriations, a plan which will enable us to provide a proper system of education, not only so far as curriculum is concerned, but giving the necessary school buildings for the city.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 54, line 22, after the word "buildings," to insert "and for the purchase of land for school purposes"; so as to make the paragraph read:

The appropriations herein made for the construction of school buildings and for the purchase of land for school purposes shall be available immediately.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 54, after line 23, to strike out:

The total cost of the sites and of the several and respective buildings herein provided for, when completed upon plans and specifications to be made previously and approved, shall not exceed the several and respective sums of money herein respectively appropriated or authorized for such purposes.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, this provision inserted by the House limits the commissioners in the purchase of sites to the amount appropriated or authorized. It would seem to be a wholesome provision. I ask the Senator in charge of the bill whether, by striking out the provision, it is the intention of the committee to leave the commissioners with authority to create deficits or to make contracts for the purchase of sites in excess of the sum authorized for those sites?

Mr. PHIPPS. The question came up for discussion and we had it up with the Comptroller General. I call the Senator's attention to the language found on page 53 preceding the language now under consideration. On page 53, line 12, the provision is:

In all, $700,000, to be disbursed and accounted for as "Buildings and grounds, public schools," and for that purpose shall constitute one fund.

The two provisions were evidently conflicting, and the attention of the Comptroller General was called to them. We had his letter stating that it would be in conflict undoubtedly, and if it were desired to handle the appropriation so that a little loss in one case might be eked out by a little taken from another item where there was a surplus, we should strike out the language which is now under consideration and allow the amount to remain as one fund in the same manner that the appropriations for the year 1923 were provided for.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator in his statement has assumed that there would be no abuse of the authority if the commissioners were vested with absolute power to spend amounts in their discretion for the purchase of sites within the limitation of $700,000. I do not mean to imply that any discretion vested in the commissioners in this respect would be abused, but I see no serious conflict in the two provisions, assuming that it is the desire of the Congress to require the commissioners in making purchases to act within the authorization. The language of the provision proposed to be stricken out by the committee amendment now under consideration is as follows:

The total cost of the sites and of the several and respective buildings herein provided for, when completed upon plans and specifications to be made previously and approved, shall not exceed the several and respective sums of money herein respectively appropriated or authorized for such purposes.

Now, is it the intention of the committee to constitute as a single fund the $700,000 referred to by the Senator from Colorado and give the commissioners discretion, if they desire to do so, to expend that entire fund on one, two, or three sites, or on one, two, or three buildings, or is it the intention of the committee, and the effect of the provision as amended by the committee, to require the purchase of all the sites and the construction and completion of all the buildings within the limitation of $700,000, allowing the commissioners latitude as to the respective sites and buildings but requiring them to complete the whole project within the sum authorized?

Mr. PHIPPS. To illustrate what has sometimes happened in the past, I would cite the two items which will be found in the bill on page 52. Beginning in line 22 is an item of $25,000 for the purchase of a new site for the Tenley School, while on page 53 we find an item of $50,000 for the purchase of additional land in the vicinity of the Slater-Langston Schools.

There have been similar cases, and I am not drawing on my imagination. In the one case it may happen that the owners of the Tenley land, for instance, say we can not have that land for $25,000. The commissioners, of course, say that that is all they can spend for it, and so they condemn it. They can not take it otherwise unless they come back for an additional appropriation. On the other hand, they come to the Slater proposition and find that they can save two or three thousand dollars in their purchase there and by applying it on the Tenley proposition they can obtain both pieces of property and save years of time.

I do not believe we are giving the commissioners too much latitude in intrusting them with the authority to use any savings they may make on one contract or in one project to eke out and finish another project. In that connection, when we provide a site for a building, as the Senator knows, we ordinarily make an appropriation for its construction, say, $50,000, on account of construction, and the commissioners are authorized to enter into contracts for the total amount of the complete structure not exceeding, say, $160,000 or $200,000, as the case may be. So we have the limitation there as to the amount of the expenditure on the contract.

Mr. ROBINSON. May I ask the Senator how the items of appropriation in this part of the bill are arrived at? How did the committee find the amount which should be appropriated in the two cases which he has taken as illustrations—the Tenley School site $25,000 and the Slater School site $50,000? Is it not true that the purchase of the particular tract of ground is in contemplation, and that the committee or the commissioners for the committee have ascertained either the value of the site or the price at which it can be purchased, and that the item as fixed in the bill responds to that information?

Mr. PHIPPS. The first move made by the commissioners is to look up the assessed value of the property and the assessed value of neighboring property so as to get a square-foot average price, and to know of actual sales that have been made in the neighborhood recently and are of record, and then to make inquiry of the owners, knowing that under the law they have the power to condemn and if the case goes to court they would have to pay in the aggregate not more than the assessed value plus a certain percentage.

Mr. ROBINSON. Of course the whole object to be conserved is the best interests of the Government, and that object, I apprehend, is uppermost in the minds of the committee reporting the amendment. Does it not occur to the Senator that if the Congress expressly authorizes an appropriation of $50,000 for the purchase of a particular tract of land, even though that may exceed the amount at which the land might otherwise have been purchased, the owner of the land or the real-estate agent authorized to sell it will insist upon the maximum amount authorized by Congress?

How many instances can the Senator cite that have come to his knowledge where Congress has authorized the expenditure of a definite sum for a particular tract of land, and that land has been purchased by the Government for less than the amount Congress had authorized to be expended therefor?

Mr. PHIPPS. I know of two or three offhand within my own knowledge within the last two or three years, since I have been endeavoring to follow the progress of legislation affecting the District. The fact that the outside figure is named in the bill does not mean that the commissioners are going to go to the owner and say, "We will give this much for the property and no more." They do not do it in that way.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator does not state quite accurately the language of the bill in that particular. It is true that the commissioners are not compelled to expend any amount or the whole amount authorized by Congress, but the language employed is:

For the purchase of a new site • • • $25,000.

Now, the real-estate agent having that land for sale, knowing the language employed, knows he can get $25,000 if he insists upon it for that particular tract of land. The conclusion the committee has reached after investigation reflects the conviction of the committee that the tract is worth that much.

The committee might make an error, in the opinion of the real estate agent or the owner of land, and fix the price too low; but I apprehend that the result of this method of procedure, while undoubtedly it would be quite convenient to have the fund treated as a single fund, would be to secure to the owners of sites who are willing to sell for the respective amounts the maximum authorization by Congress, and give others encouragement, at least, to insist upon larger sums for their tracts where they feel the amount is insufficient, inasmuch as larger sums may be taken from the appropriation as a whole.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I shall say only a few words in answer to the Senator from Arkansas. Frankly, if it were a personal matter of my own, and I had an agent who was comparable with the District Commissioner who handles these transactions, I would not limit him in amount as to any one item. I would say, "Here is so much money; there are so many pieces of property to be acquired; go and do the best you can." That is the only way we could acquire property to better advantage than under the methods now employed. The committee recognizes the unfortunate fact that a price has to be fixed in the appropriation bill as the upset price for a piece of property. It would be much better if we could proceed under the other plan, giving the commissioner so much money to expend for school sites, and then let them make the best bargain they could.

Mr. ROBINSON. I am not at all sure that the Senator's conclusion in that particular would prove correct. The net result of all legislation specifying certain amounts for sites and buildings has been that the commissioner has often spent more for one site than the act authorized, provided he could purchase other sites or construct the buildings contemplated for less than the respective appropriations for those particular sites and buildings. I fear that such practice is not in the interest of economy, but that it will tend to encourage extravagance rather than to promote economy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I was absent from the Chamber when page 53 of the bill was considered, and particularly the item to which I desire to call attention. I now invite the attention of the Senator having the bill in charge to lines 1 and 2, on page 53. The provision of the bill reads:

For the purchase of land for school purposes adjacent to the Langley Junior High School, $215,000.

I wish to say to the Senator that I have no knowledge of this matter except such as has been furnished me by a letter which I have received from Mr. Clinton R. Thompson, chairman of the school committee of the Piney Branch Citizens' Association. Mr. Thompson has recommended an amendment to this provision of the bill. His amendment is to strike out the language which I have just read, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

For beginning the construction of a new McKinley Manual Training School on land now owned by the District of Columbia, adjacent to Macfarland Junior High School, $215,000; and the limit of cost of said McKinley Manual Training School is hereby fixed at $1,500,000.

Mr. PHIPPS. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that under agreement we are now considering committee amendments. I am not even now offering amendments which have met with the favor of and have been recommended by the committee. The particular amendment to which the Senator refers is one which has been in print for several days, having been offered by the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS]. At the proper time, if the Senator from Kansas desires to propose the amendment, or if the Senator from Utah desires to do so, it may be considered.

While we are on that question, however, I may say that the subcommittee visited the alternative site proposed and decided in favor of the one which received the approval of the other House—the neighborhood of Langley Junior High School rather than the Macfarland Junior High School.

Mr. KING. In view of the agreement first to consider reported amendments, I shall not press this matter until we shall have concluded the program agreed upon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the next amendment.

The reading of the bill was resumed at line 20, page 55, and continued to the end of line 5 on page 57, being the clause providing for the salaries of the Metropolitan police.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have not investigated and have had no time to enter into an investigation of the police needs of the city of Washington, but it seems to me that there must be some method of improving the conditions which surround traffic in the streets of this city. We have here a city of something less than half a million inhabitants. It has as a whole—I am not speaking now of individual avenues—the widest and best streets, perhaps, of any city in this country and, probably, in the world.

Mr. KING. Except the city in which I reside.

Mr. LODGE. Except possibly the home city of the Senator from Utah; but I still insist on my original statement. Yet, so far as my experience goes in American cities, I think Washington is the most dangerous city in the country for travelers, whether in motor cars or on foot.

Within the past week the record of one day's serious automobile accidents was nine persons injured, five of whom were killed. They had been knocked down by automobiles; and from the accounts in the newspapers of those occurrences in every case the injuries and deaths were caused by reckless and careless driving.

Despite the wide streets of Washington, there is an amount of automobile parking permitted which reduces them to narrow streets. Anyone who has occasion to go to the principal shopping streets, F Street and H Street, for instance, finds permanent parking there to such an extent that it is impossible to get up to the shop doors, and there is apparently no limitation, as there is in other cities, of the time during which a vehicle may be halted in front of the shop.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a statement there?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. I think the Senator is in error about that, particularly as to F Street, because there is a limitation as to the length of time any vehicle may be parked on F Street.

Mr. LODGE. I very seldom go shopping; but the Senator's statement is contrary to my experience and my observation. If the Senator is correct, then I should say the law is not enforced.

Mr. ROBINSON. If the Senator will pardon me further, I think the trouble goes even deeper than that. I think the police are very prompt in the enforcement of the parking regulations.

Mr. LODGE. In making automobiles move on?

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes, sir. The difficulty is that in the shopping centers of the city business is so congested that to permit parking at all upon those streets brings about the condition which the Senator has described. The only way, so far as I can see, to relieve it would be to prohibit for any period of time, other than that necessary to take on or discharge passengers, the parking of automobiles on F Street. Certainly the traffic conditions, so far as heavy trucks are concerned, might be very greatly improved by further regulations and their rigid enforcement.

Mr. LODGE. That is precisely what I am aiming at. The streets of the old portion of Boston, my native city, are very narrow—Boston being an old city—and the same statement applies to lower New York. In those streets of the cities referred to if vehicles were not compelled to move on traffic would be congested, it would become impossible for it to move. The same thing is true, of course, of London with its narrow streets. In Washington, however, automobiles draw up to the curb and remain there a sufficient length of time almost to block continuously passage along certain streets. Between the White House offices and the State Department there is a short but wide street on both sides of which automobiles are parked from morning until night, making the passageway, the fairway, as it is called on the water, extremely narrow. Those automobiles are parked there for the convenience of clerks in the departments, I have ascertained on inquiry. That is but one of many instances. It seems to me that something ought to be done by the commissioners or by the police to make traffic safer, and there ought to be more traffic policemen at the points of crossing where there is a great deal of business passing both ways.

There is also very reckless driving in Washington. The law against reckless driving may be adequate; certainly there are ordinances against it, but they are not enforced. I have not studied the question sufficiently to know whether that is because the police are incompetent or whether they are too few.

I have been looking at the figures for New York and Boston, they being the two cities which I happen to know best—and that is the reason I take them for comparison—and I find there are 34 patrolmen to the square mile in New York and 37 to the square mile in Boston, while in Washington, I think, there are 9 to the square mile. We may be imposing a burden on the police beyond their power; but certainly there are many crossings in this city where there ought to be very efficient traffic policemen stationed all the time.

There is no reason why Washington should not be the safest as well as the best paved and best lighted city in the country. It is not a commercial city; it is not an industrial city, and heavy traffic is not very great in volume in comparison with such traffic in other cities. That may be one reason for the extreme rapidity with which automobiles are driven through the streets the moment they get out of sight of a policeman. Particular sinners, so far as my observation goes, are delivery wagons of shops, driven generally by boys, and motor vehicles belonging to the Government of the United States. There are not as many as there used to be at one time, which is perhaps a good thing, but they add very much to the perils of pedestrians in this city. It has become serious enough, it seems to me, for Congress to give some attention to it; and the District Commissioners ought to feel that the first person to be considered are not the minority of automobile owners, but the first persons to be considered are the great majority of the population who walk or who do not park and block the streets with automobiles.

It seems a pity that in this, the Capitol of the Nation, there should not be proper regulation, and, if necessary, enough police. I do not think we have enough police. I am not going to offer an amendment, for I have not investigated the matter sufficiently; but we certainly ought to have more than nine to a square mile.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I quite agree with what the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has said. I do not know whether the remedy lies in increasing the police force or not; but something ought to be done about this matter in the city of Washington. It has become the most dangerous city in America, according to the information that I have and according to the reports that we get. Foot passengers seem to have no rights at all that an automobile or truck or taxi driver is bound to respect.

I have always understood that a man on foot in a city had the right to have safe sidewalks and safe streets upon which to travel, and the municipality is held responsible if those highways are kept or permitted to be in such a state that an accident is likely to happen to any citizen passing along; but here in Washington a man takes his life in his hands nearly every day when he attempts to cross a street anywhere.

I do not know whether or not the number of policemen ought to be increased, but it would appear so from the fact that in practically every case where an accident happens there is no policeman anywhere about, and when a person who is walking properly and legitimately on the streets is run down and killed there is nobody to testify in the case except the operator of the automobile. That operator appears in court and says: "Why, this woman, or this man, ran against my running board and attacked my car and committed suicide," and there you are. There is nobody there to question it. Nobody has seen the accident except the man operating the car, and the unfortunate victim is silent forever; and when the case comes up in court the man operating the car is discharged, and that ends the matter. That closes the incident.

I think in the recent case here of Mrs. Hill, the person who ran that car and killed her was discharged when the case came into court; and so it is in nearly every instance. He had a hearing, and was discharged, and that is the record right along. There are no policemen, no officers anywhere about, to testify regarding the facts. The only witness is the person who operated the car, and he testifies, and the case is thrown out of court; and so it is day after day. Those things are happening here right along.

I introduced a bill at one time, and have offered it as an amendment to the pending bill, regulating traffic in the District, changing the rule of evidence so that when an accident occurs a presumption of fact shall arise that the person operating the car was guilty of negligence. Instead of putting upon the person who is maimed or killed the burden of proving negligence, the man operating the car must establish by a preponderance of the evidence that he was not negligent. That would have some effect, I think. Changing the rule of evidence with respect to that condition would have a good effect, and I think would have a tendency to make more careful these people who operate automobiles, taxis, and trucks; but I am inclined to think that we do need more policemen, because in many of these dangerous places I never see a policeman at all. I walk quite a good deal, and I rarely see a policeman, although I have seen many instances of careless driving, reckless driving, endangering human life. I see it every day, and particularly with reference to passing street cars. When people are getting on or getting off street cars, half the time the automobile drivers do not observe the rule that they must stop to allow people to get off a street car or get on a street car. They run around them, and take all sorts of chances, and I never see a policeman. Many a time I have looked about to try to find one to make complaint, but I can not see them; and I do not think the policemen are neglecting their duty, either. I do not intend to charge that at all. I think there are not enough of them in the city.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I was just wondering whether the Senator had heard the Washington definition of "the quick or the dead"—the quick being those who are able to get out of the way of automobiles, and the dead those who are not quick enough to get out of the way.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I should like to say for the Record that last year's bill came to the Senate with an increase of 17 patrolmen. The Senate committee added 75. In conference that number was cut down to 42, so that the net addition to the bill was 59; but at the same time, by reason of the passage of a separate bill creating the White House special police force, we released 54 patrolmen from the White House grounds, and their services became available for the regular force. This year's bill comes to us with an increase of only one captain and five patrolmen. That was the Budget estimate, approved by the House, and, of course, the commissioners were rather precluded from coming to the committee to ask for an increase. They did not ask for an increase over the Budget. We had no intimation that they thought the allowance was too light or that they favored an increase. They made no expression on the subject. In addition to the 1,087 policemen who are on the rolls to-day there are a number of crossing policemen who are paid by the tramway companies. The exact number of those officers I have not at the moment, but there are quite a number of them, and they care for the down-town section and the crowded centers; but the committee had no basis or authority on which to propose an additional increase this year.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and other Senators have discussed at some length a question that is not pending before the Senate. That is to say, no provision in this bill and no amendment proposed to it contemplates any reform of the conditions complained of. It is doubtful whether an increase in the number of policemen will accomplish the very wholesome purpose of protecting the public in Washington from avoidable traffic accidents. The difficulties grow in part out of the way in which the city of Washington is laid out.

In nearly every city in the country other than the city of Washington, the streets run at right angles to one another, and the points of intersection are not so numerous as they are here. While our city is beautifully laid out, the manner in which the streets are extended certainly is not calculated to promote the safety of the public, especially under the conditions that obtain with respect to automobile traffic.

We have a system of streets at right angles, the city being divided into four sections with reference to the compass, and the streets being arranged in each of these four sections practically identically, the streets running north and south commencing near the Capitol being numbered, the streets running east and west commencing near the Capitol being lettered, all the letters being used, as I remember, except J, X, Y, and Z; so that at almost every important point in the city we not only have the streets crossing one another at right angles but we have intersecting them a system of avenues at obtuse angles, and also a system of "roads" and "places" which make the plan of the city quite complex, and which make the efficient handling of traffic, in so far as it affects the safety of the public, more difficult than it is in any other city within my knowledge.

Boston has been referred to by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and is mentioned by my colleague [Mr. CARAWAY]. In that city the streets are very narrow, and in many instances they are not straight. Nevertheless the principle that I have laid down is applicable even to the city of Boston, with its many crooked streets; so that is one condition that it is fair to take into consideration when discussing this subject.

Another is that with the enormous increase in automobile traffic, particularly in the shopping districts, it has become necessary further to revise the regulations. There ought not to be any parking of automobiles on F Street, and there are other localities in the city where parking must be prevented by action of the city authorities or of the Congress.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator that possibly some rule might be laid down requiring some of these congested streets to be made one-way streets?

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; that is a very good suggestion.

Mr. ROBINSON. But I think the desired end can be better accomplished for the convenience of the public by simply allowing automobiles to appear on those streets where the traffic is so greatly congested only for the purpose of taking on or discharging passengers and requiring them to find their parking spaces elsewhere; and, in addition to that, I would make this suggestion—

Mr. LODGE. I think that reaches the great point of difficulty.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not know to what extent the city authorities have gone into the subject. I know that they are intelligent men and they must have given thought to it, and probably they have prescribed some regulations to control it; but one of the worst difficulties, one of the greatest dangers that menaces the safety of pedestrians in the District of Columbia and persons riding in passenger automobiles grows out of the manner in which large trucks are operated, and the places where they are permitted to go. There is no excuse for permitting a heavy truck to go on F Street, or on Pennsylvania Avenue for that matter, except when it goes there for the purpose of taking on or discharging merchandise. There is no Senator present who has not observed recklessness approaching criminality among the operators of trucks in the District of Columbia. They disregard every traffic regulation respecting right of way. It is the common, the general practice of truck operators in the District of Columbia to take the right of way in spite of the regulations in the District of Columbia, and they take it by the mere weight and power of the vehicle they are driving. The result is that a citizen who is operating an automobile or an individual who is walking along the street, relying upon the operator of a truck to observe the traffic regulations, takes the right of way when he is entitled to it, expecting the truck driver to respect the regulations, only to find his automobile destroyed or his person injured, if not his life taken by the criminal negligence of the truck driver. That condition can be quickly remedied, and it ought to be remedied, by the District authorities.

The remedy suggests itself. If policemen would arrest the operators of trucks in the District of Columbia when they see them violating the regulations respecting the right of way, that condition would end, particularly if the driver were deprived of his license.

In addition to this, the regulations should be modified so as to permit heavy trucks to go upon certain streets only under conditions which make it necessary for them to go there. If such precautions be taken it will not be necessary, in my judgment, to increase the number of policemen to handle traffic in the District of Columbia. The traffic policemen in the District of Columbia are as efficient as are to be found in any city in the United States. They display a degree of patience and tolerance that at times is amazing, and they certainly are not to be condemned, but are to be commended. But, with all that, you can not remedy the evil conditions respecting traffic in the District of Columbia by doubling the number of the policemen, because you can never have a sufficient number to have one present at all places where danger may arise or where accidents may occur. So that the proper remedy would seem to be to enforce the regulations, particularly those respecting the right of way; keep the heavy trucks off the streets where pedestrians are compelled to go and where automobiles customarily go; and deny operators of automobiles the right to park on certain streets in the shopping district for any considerable length of time.

Mr. LODGE. I agree with the Senator in his suggestion that trucks be allowed to go only on certain streets, and that things would be better if the laws were strictly enforced; but I must say that I think that the stopping of speeding, which, after all, is the principal source of accident, is best achieved when we have more police than we have in certain parts of the city here, so as to make people who speed entirely uncertain as to when they will see the next policeman.

Mr. ROBINSON. I think if the Senator will investigate the matter he will find that speeding, while very dangerous, is more rarely the cause of injury or accident than would at first appear. Every traffic man knows that the rapid moving of traffic often relieves congestion quickly and averts the danger of collision. In some cities you will find that if you drive slowly you will be arrested for doing so, because the traffic must move with a certain degree of speed. I want to make this suggestion: We talk about these matters with a great deal of earnestness and come to no conclusion except to agree among ourselves that something ought to be done. This whole subject ought to be studied by a subcommittee of the Committee on the District of Columbia, and if necessary the advice and opinion of experts ought to be procured, a plan ought to be devised and brought into the Congress, and whatever legislation is necessary to put it into effect ought to be considered by the Congress and enacted.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I do not know whether I can contribute anything to the wisdom that has already been displayed in regard to the regulation of traffic in Washington, but I want to suggest to the District Committee that they might find a remedy in following the provisions of the automobile acts in the various States, which provide for the examination of chauffeurs under a yearly license and a penalty of cancellation of the license when they evade the law or when any accident happens through their negligence. If the commissioners should adopt a regulation of that character and deprive the driver of his license when he disobeys the law, you will find that they will observe the speed and traffic regulations. That was applied in New Jersey and the number of accidents was reduced fourfold.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. I merely desire to say that that identical suggestion was made to me when I took my seat by my colleague, the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY]. He also made this suggestion, that a person operating an automobile which injures anyone should have the onus of proving that the injury occurred without the negligence of the operator of the automobile, and should remain in custody until the investigation has been made and a conclusion has been reached. I do not know whether it would be possible to enact legislation so stringent as that, but I am satisfied that if it could be enacted such a measure, together with the revision of the regulations in the particulars mentioned, would go a long way toward making the individual who visits Washington feel that he is not guilty of gross negligence in appearing upon the streets of the city.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I may say to the Senator that I have been informed that the accidents in the city of Washington are twice the number in any other city in the United States. That is the report of the accident insurance companies, and the companies which insure automobiles. If you regulate that by penalizing the driver of the automobile, first, compelling him to take an examination, licensing him under the regulations, and then, if he evades the law or disobeys the law, deprive him of his right of livelihood and his right to drive, these careless men who kill people in Washington will be more careful and the number of accidents will be reduced.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I ask the Senator whether any of those acts provide for a forfeiture of the machine? It seems to me that the act should go even further, and not only provide for a forfeiture of the license but for a forfeiture of the machine.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Of course, I suppose you could bring a suit for damages against the owner of a commercial truck or a commercial automobile. The law to which I have referred was applied in New Jersey, and that was the initial law passed in this country. It has been copied by 33 States in the Union. The District of Columbia, I understand, has not adopted similar regulations; but if you would examine a driver and see that he is competent to drive an automobile, instead of allowing school boys and little colored boys to drive machines, as is done in the city of Washington, if you would ascertain, through some proper department, that a man was competent to drive, you would minimize the number of accidents in this city, whether you had more policemen or not.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I want to add just one thing to what the Senator from New Jersey has said. In the first place, if a driver is denied the right to operate a machine after he has been the cause of an accident, that is about the only punishment you can inflict on him that he really would appreciate, and seek to avoid. I think, however, the law ought to go far enough to make every man who owns a machine liable for whatever damage may occur, regardless of who drives it, because the owner of the machine ought to know the character of the man he puts in charge of his vehicle, and ought to be liable for any injury which may be occasioned by the reckless driving.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is the law now, is it not?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. He is liable under the law as it is now.

Mr. CARAWAY. He is liable, but with so many modifications that he always finds a modification that gets him out of it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. CARAWAY. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator says that the only thing that would bother the chauffeur would be depriving him of his license. Does not the Senator think that if moderate jail sentences were given instead of fines, it would have a wholesome deterring effect on others as well as the man himself? My judgment is that one of the great troubles here in Washington is that chauffeurs who are guilty of negligence and bring about accidents are either turned loose or fined. They care nothing in the world about fines. They ought to be put in jail even for a few days in the case of a light offense, and more days in jail in case of greater negligence. If the judges would put them in jail, I am quite sure there would be very much fewer accidents.

Mr. CARAWAY. I am sure of that, too; but the ordinary chauffeur regards a jail sentence as just so much time lost if he can get his machine as soon as he gets out. He ought to be deprived of his right to drive, and anybody who causes an injury to a person ought to go to jail. I have become thoroughly disgusted. In the city of Washington nearly every day some child is killed, and the coroner investigates and finds that it is an unavoidable accident. There are no unavoidable accidents. Whenever a man hits somebody when driving a motor car, he could have avoided it. When anybody looks after the driving of his vehicle and observes the street, however reckless the pedestrian may be, he can avoid the accident. I have driven a car myself—if you will permit a Ford to be so classified—and I know from years and years of experience there is never a time, if a man is driving with any care for those who walk, when he should injure anybody. Two men driving cars may run into each other, but that can be avoided; and if the coroner would quit always accepting the statement of an irresponsible driver of a car that the child who was killed ran into the street in front of him or that somebody walked out from behind another vehicle and he could not avoid striking him, and if the authorities would enforce the law, they could protect life.

I am sure, from years of experience, that there is absolutely no excuse for a man who, in driving a car, kills another. Of course if he wants to go out and hold hands with somebody, I rather imagine he might be guilty of hitting some one and be able truthfully to swear that he did not see the person he struck; or if he wants to talk and look off while driving, he might be able to truthfully say he did not see the person in time to avoid the accident; but if he is paying attention, he can avoid accidents. A man who drives a car in a crowded street ought to have so much regard for human life, and especially for the lives of children, as to watch the street, and I know he can avoid accidents. He should keep both hands on the wheel, as the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] suggests.

The regularity with which the coroner, regardless of how an accident occurs, always find that the person who is injured or killed was at fault is a crime. If there is no law sufficient to punish people, Congress should enact one, raising to the grade of homicide cases where somebody recklessly kills another through negligence in driving an automobile. We read every day of some reckless driver of a car which he does not own dashing around the corner and killing some little child playing in the street. Let us make the punishment so severe that he will never drive another car while he lives. I am out of patience with the way these cases are handled. There is no excuse for it. There have been 8 or 10 deaths in the city of Washington within the last 30 days due to reckless automobile driving, and every man who caused one of those deaths is as guilty as if he had gone out and cut somebody's throat, because he could have avoided it. I do not care what the coroner may say in relieving him of punishment, I know he could have avoided it.

The authorities should take the license away from any man who causes an accident. For a second offense or disregarding the traffic regulations, take the license away from them and let them do something else for a living. A man who does not observe regulations ought not to be entrusted with a car. Make the owner liable wherever the injury is to individuals, and wherever one strikes an individual send him to jail until the facts are thoroughly investigated and it is determined that he is not responsible. That may be drastic, but the man who is so reckless as to kill, and particularly the one who kills children in the street, ought to be punished, and the punishment can never be too severe.

I want to say that the traffic policemen here are efficient, but a traffic policeman ordinarily retards and does not expedite traffic. Only in the most congested centers ought there to be traffic policemen. Put them at crossings up and down the streets generally, and they actually retard and do not facilitate traffic. Make the drivers responsible, and let the traffic seek its natural flow. We would not gain safety by increasing the number of policemen and we do not gain safety by traffic policemen. We simply cause all the traffic to congest, and when there are turned loose frequently 8 or 10 or 15 cars in one body, turning from right to left, accidents are caused. Remove the traffic policemen except at the most congested corners, punish the driver and punish the owner of the motor vehicle, and we can get rid of the condition.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, may I state just a word in this connection? While it is not the province of the subcommittee or the Committee on Appropriations to deal with the question of the methods of affording ample protection as against automobile traffic, the members of the committee did take occasion to call the attention of the various officials of the District to the existing situation. We learned at the time that they were in conference with representatives of the State of Maryland and trying to get together on a new plan for licensing automobiles, and at the same time to have the same character of road regulations, traffic regulations, and so forth.

I am not at all meaning to say that it is not a proper time for the Members of the Senate to discuss the question. I am merely trying to say for the Appropriations Committee that while it did not feel within its province to suggest as an appropriations committee what should be done to cure the existing situation, yet it did call the attention of the city authorities to the very well-grounded complaints which have been made because of the excessive number of accidents which have been occurring in the District.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. PHIPPS. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the Senator if the clause the Senator has been discussing had to do with the exchange of automobile licenses between the District of Columbia and the State of Maryland?

Mr. PHIPPS. That question is not up for consideration. We were discussing the personnel of the police department.

Mr. HARRISON. I was in hopes that the Senator would discuss, before the bill is passed, the question of some kind of a reciprocal agreement, about which we see something in the papers, between the District of Columbia and the State of Maryland touching the use of District licenses in Maryland and of Maryland licenses in the District.

Mr. PHIPPS. I would say to the Senator that that was not in the bill as it came to us, nor did the committee feel that it was justified in presenting something in regard to it, and particularly at the moment when the commissioners and other authorities are in conference with representatives of the State of Maryland in an effort to arrive at a mutual understanding and agreement covering the matter. That would come in some other bill perhaps more suitably than in the bill under discussion at the moment. I think it is really legislation. It is a matter that could be brought in very promptly by the Committee on the District of Columbia rather than the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HARRISON. So the commissioners representing the District of Columbia are now conferring with the authorities of the State of Maryland to try to adjust the matter?

Mr. PHIPPS. They are. They are trying to arrive at an agreement not only as to licenses and gasoline tax, but also traffic regulations.

Mr. HARRISON. So nothing will be done in connection with the pending bill touching that matter?

Mr. PHIPPS. Nothing has been proposed in the bill as yet. The committee has not considered doing so. It felt that it should be the province of the Committee on the District of Columbia to formulate such legislation.

Mr. HARRISON. I may say in this connection that I do not care what committee does it, but I was in hopes that some kind of an agreement could be reached so that some understanding between the State of Maryland and the District of Columbia with respect to the use of automobile license tags might be had. I do not like to take the chance of being arrested when I go over into Maryland, and I am sure the genial Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES], now presiding over the Senate, would not like to be arrested if he went over there. Of course we both conduct ourselves in such way that there is no opportunity to get arrested, but just because one does not have a tag carrying a Maryland number should not, it seems to me, justify his arrest. There ought to be some sort of reciprocity about the matter. I hope it will be worked out, and that during the present session of Congress we may be able to pass the proper legislation which will put it into effect.

The reading of the bill was continued.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head "Metropolitan police, miscellaneous," on page 57, line 15, to increase the appropriation for fuel from "$7,000" to "$10,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 58, line 19, to increase the appropriation for maintenance of motor vehicles and the replacement of those worn out in the service and condemned from "$25,000" to "$35,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 58, after line 19, to insert:

For marking traffic lines for cross walks at street intersections, including personal services, materials, and supplies, $2,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, we are making very rapid progress with the District appropriation bill, and, to disturb the monotony of the consideration of the bill, I ask permission to read an editorial from a very great paper—the Chicago Tribune—upon another matter which will be before us within a few days. I do it in the hope that the committee having in charge the bill to which the editorial refers will be admonished to pursue an economical course in dealing with it.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MOSES in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. KING. Certainly.

Mr. PHIPPS. May I inquire if the editorial relates in any way to the measure now before the Senate, and if it would not be better to have it printed in the RECORD so that all Senators might see it, or does the Senator think it is going to be well to have those present considering the bill take the time necessary to hear it, when it can be read in the RECORD?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator from Colorado asks the question in such a naive way, and with so much apparent innocence, that I am almost inclined to abandon the resolution which I had to read the editorial. But I will tell the Senator that it is a very important editorial, and while it does not relate directly to the matter under consideration it does relate to appropriations. Knowing that the Senator is upon the Committee on Appropriations, I am sure he will be doubly interested in the editorial, particularly as it comes from a Republican newspaper. The editorial is from the Chicago Tribune of January 20, 1923, and reads:

The pork barrel again.

That is an expression with which we are familiar, particularly in dealing with appropriation bills.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Does it speak of automobiles?

Mr. KING. No. I read:

In the palmy days of the rivers and harbors pork barrel appropriations used to run to about forty millions. It is something of a shock, therefore, to learn that the chairman of the House Rivers and Harbors Committee asks for $56,539,910.

Why this enormous inflation? What are the sudden needs for river and harbor expenditure which justify such a demand? We used to be free spenders in those days before the Great War debt, yet our $40,000,000 barrels were a scandal which brought on budget reform. How is it, then, that now, with American business and the American taxpayers, which includes us every one, urging economy, we are asked for $56,500,000?

We know the old game well, the converging pressure of local appetite for Government money. It was a tremendous pressure, and Congress usually yielded to it until the facts of the outrageous waste it covered were forced into the open. But now, apparently, the system has revived, and its vitality is shown by the fact that it revives in the face of a universal demand for economy and relief from mountainous taxation.

The greed of localities and special interests can not be killed, but it should be fought to a standstill in the interest of the Nation. We have poured hundreds of millions into creeks that could not float a raft and rivers that hardly know a barge. The story has been told while the Nation gasped, and that was when our taxes were a joke compared to what they are to-day. Must we fight that fight all over again? It looks as if we should have to, and the quicker we begin the better.

Fortunately, we have entrenchments now to fight from. They are the new Budget system in Congress.

The editorial must have been written before the House—and I speak with all due respect to the body at the other end of the Capitol—flouted the report of the Budget Bureau, took the bit in its own teeth, and appropriated, I think, a larger sum than is indicated in this editorial:

What we really are fighting for is that system, the system of consistent, orderly appropriation of Government funds in proper relation to our needs and our revenue. A business nation should tolerate no other method of expenditure. If we could be reckless before the Great War debt, we can not afford to waste public money to-day.

Now, how does this rivers and harbors appropriation stand in the light of Budget control as directed by the House Committee on Appropriations?

That committee recommended a new appropriation of $27,000,000. There is a balance of $12,000,000 in this fund. That makes $39,000,000, or virtually the sum of the old pork barrel before the war. Then pressure was brought to bear and the committee added $10,000,000 to the original recommendation. Thus the total to be appropriated ran up to $49,000,000.

But the chairman of the Rivers and Harbors Appropriation Committee was not satisfied. He wants $7,500,000 more, or a total of over $56,500,000.

At a time when appropriations for the vital purposes of the national defense have been cut below the minimum of its needs, when there is general demand for retrenchment and most urgent need for economy, such a demand for inflated expenditure on rivers and harbors should not be granted. The Appropriations Committee, which has cut the Army and the Navy ruthlessly, and even dangerously, should have stood by its original recommendation. But there is supposed to be no politics in maintaining the Army and the Navy. When it comes to wasting the Nation's money on river contracts, there is something doing.

I would like to add by way of parentheses that the attitude of the writer of the editorial with respect to appropriations for the Navy, I think, is not accurate. We have appropriated, directly and indirectly, more than $300,000,000 for the Navy, perhaps $325,000,000 to $330,000,000 for the next fiscal year for the Navy.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. KING. It was an extravagant appropriation rather than the reverse, as is indicated in the editorial.

I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. CARAWAY. That is what I was going to ask the Senator. The Senator realizes that the editor does not know what he is talking about when he refers to naval appropriations, does he not?

Mr. KING. I will not say that he does not know what he is talking about.

Mr. CARAWAY. At any rate, he does not represent the fact as the Senator sees it?

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. Then, why should the Senator have any faith in what he says about rivers and harbors? Possibly he knows nothing more about rivers and harbors than he does about appropriations for the Navy.

Mr. KING. The Senator from Arkansas knows many things upon many subjects, but I fancy that there are some subjects upon which his knowledge may not be very profound. So this editorial writer knows perhaps many things and knows them well as to many subjects; and when he comes to deal with the Navy, he may know all about the Navy; and he may think that an appropriation of $335,000,000 is not too great; possessing, as he does, a navalistic if not a militaristic mind.

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes; and he doubtless lives upon the sea. May I ask the Senator from what paper the editorial is quoted?

Mr. KING. I am quoting it from the Chicago Tribune.

Mr. CARAWAY. Well, there is a lake there, and there is a naval training station. It is difficult sometimes, the Senator knows, for a man who does not know a river when he sees it, to realize that rivers need improvement.

However, I was going to ask the Senator another question. The Senator is one of the very best lawyers the Senate ever had.

Mr. KING. I thank the Senator.

Mr. CARAWAY. I say that seriously. The rule of evidence prevails, I think, everywhere that when a witness testifies recklessly about a material fact that the jury is entitled wholly to dismiss his testimony if it sees fit to do so, does it not?

Mr. KING. Unless his testimony shall be corroborated by other credible testimony.

Mr. CARAWAY. But so far as that witness is concerned, the jury may totally disregard his statement. So when we find this editor does not know what he is talking about in reference to one subject, would we not be justified in saying that we should totally disregard his opinion about other matters?

Mr. KING. I think he knows so much about the river and harbor appropriations that I am inclined to give a great deal of credence to his testimony upon that subject.

Mr. CARAWAY. That is simply because the Senator from Utah is familiar with but one river, which rises where nobody knows and ends where nobody cares, and he naturally presumes that a river is without use because the only river he has in his State rises somewhere and ends somewhere, but goes nowhere, and the water in it contains so much salt that one can not drink it, although, of course, that does not interfere with its use, and fish can not be put in it because they would get pickled before they could be taken out. [Laughter.] It is not navigable, because it is like some of the speeches in the Senate, it is very long but very shallow [laughter] and therefore not subject to be improved. Of course, I do not refer to the speeches of the Senator from Utah, but I was referring to my own.

I suggest, however, in view of the facts, that if I did not believe that the editor knew much about the Navy I would not put much faith in what he has said about rivers and harbors.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I regret that the Senator from Arkansas should interject personalities into the discussion of this matter.

Mr. CARAWAY. I beg pardon. I was not doing that.

Mr. KING. The Senator may quarrel with the editor as much as he pleases, and he may attribute to myself as much ignorance with reference to rivers and harbors as he pleases. When the river and harbor appropriations shall be discussed, undoubtedly there will be demonstrated how much knowledge the Senator has about the rivers and harbors of the United States.

I might add, parenthetically, that we have had river and harbor bills before us ever since I have been in the Senate. I took occasion to spend more than six months in a critical examination of every report that I could obtain showing the appropriations for rivers and harbors from the beginning of our Government until the year 1919. I examined every report that had been submitted to the Senate and to the House of Representatives, and every report prepared by the engineers of the Army and by those who had to do with the rivers and harbors, the appropriations for which aggregated more than $1,000,000,000. I have not any hesitancy in stating, Mr. President, from a critical examination of nearly 20,000 pages of the record that more than one-half of the more than $1,000,000,000 appropriated by the Government of the United States for rivers and harbors was wasted.

I will now pursue the reading of this editorial:

Our expenditures run nowadays in the billions, so a few tens of millions more or less may not seem worth a fight. But every dollar is worth a fight, and in this case there is an issue involved of first-rank importance to the American people. It is the issue of Budget control. It is the issue of orderly, consistent appropriation in the interest of sound government finance and the general welfare, as against the old system of logrolling and waste. That means billions saved in years to come, and they, at least, are worth fighting to save. The House should take a stand on this issue. And if the House will not, the Senate should not fail to defend the public interest against private and local greed. The time to save Budget control is now when public opinion is unanimous for economy. The unnecessary expenditure of ten or twenty millions may or may not be a small matter. The assertion of Budget control is one of the most important duties before Congress to-day, if not indeed the most important.

I commend the editorial, Mr. President, to the Committee on Appropriations, that will have before it the river and harbor appropriations as they come from the House of Representatives.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I wish to apologize to the Senator from Utah. I had no intention of being offensive, but probably I had but a poor sense of humor.

I was not criticizing the Senator's knowledge of rivers and harbors except in a facetious way. I have observed, however, that when expenditures are to be made in the section of the country with which one is familiar, and therefore can properly appreciate the need, they are rarely criticized.

The people of the West have built up great reclamation projects. They have erected dams, have reclaimed deserts, have made fertile fields where theretofore there was nothing but waste land, and have added to the permanent wealth of the Nation, but, comparing the results obtained, it has cost $2 for every acre of land that has been reclaimed in the West to $1 that has been used in river and harbor improvements. Honestly, the only investment in this country of Government funds that has actually paid a dividend is that which has been made to reclaim land along the great rivers of this country.

I naturally presumed the Senator from Utah had in view the appropriation contained in the bill to which he refers for the improvement of the lower Mississippi River. I can remember, if I may be permitted to say so, one county in Arkansas—Mississippi County—where twenty-odd years ago I taught school; and, incidentally, I did not teach a second session because nobody asked me to do so. In that county at that time there was not a quarter section of land that would have sold for $40 an acre. There were a few farms lying along the river banks and bayous, because those localities were higher than the back country, but 90 per cent of the county was a swamp. During 23 years that county has made such progress under river improvements that this year it grew 100,000 bales of cotton; it grew one-tenth of all the cotton that was grown in the State of Arkansas; it grew almost one-fifth as much as was grown in the great sovereign State of South Carolina; it grew one-eighth as much as was grown in the State of Mississippi; it grew 1 per cent of all the cotton that was grown in the United States. In addition to that, it was one of the foremost counties of the South in the production of corn, alfalfa, and wheat. Those figures show the result of river improvement in one county alone. That county has paid back to the Government, in the shape of income and excess-profits tax, ten times more than the Government ever expended in improving the river front of that county, in addition to all the advantage derived by traffic on the river. What is true of that county is true in a lesser or greater degree of other counties in these United States. In other words, every dollar that this Government ever expended on river improvement has paid a dividend, while the expenditures which have been made in many other directions, including those for the Army and Navy, have paid at least merely moral dividends.

I am not criticizing the reclamation projects of the West, where the Senator from Utah lives, although it costs three times as much to reclaim a homestead there as it does to reclaim a homestead in the great fertile valleys of the rivers, against the expenditure of public money for the improvement of which the Senator from Utah so eloquently declaims.

The Senator from Utah said he had critically examined 20,000 pages of evidence. The word "critically" explains the manner in which it was done. A man ought to examine such questions sympathetically and not "critically."

HOOR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts obtained the floor.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator to make a request in regard to the hour of meeting to-morrow? Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I am glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. WARREN. I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business to-day it shall take a recess until to-morrow at 11 o'clock a. m.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FREELINGHUYSEN in the chair). The Senator from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business to-day, it shall recess until 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

THE TARIFF AND INCREASED COST OF WOOLEN GOODS.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I wish to occupy the time of the Senate for a few minutes to call attention to a statement in the press to-day which confirms the claim made by the Democratic minority in this Chamber last summer that the high duties levied in the Fordney-McCumber tariff act upon raw wool would lead to a substantial increase in the price of clothing. That claim was made repeatedly by the manufacturers of clothing in this country and by the members of the Democratic minority in this Chamber. It was denied most emphatically by leading members of the majority party.

Before I present the facts which are disclosed in the press of to-day I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the language used by certain leaders of the Republican majority in making the claim that there would be no increase in the cost of clothing to the consumers by reason of the imposition of a rate of 33 cents per pound upon raw wool. I first desire to quote from the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], who took, perhaps, the most prominent part in presenting the views of the majority when the wool schedule was under consideration. I quote from page 10558 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of date July 22 last. The senior Senator from Utah was asked this question by me:

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I want to ask one question. What does the Senator say will be the increased cost on the wool in a suit of clothes, the average suit of clothes worn by the average American citizen, by reason of this duty?

Mr. SMOOT. Over existing law?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. On the ordinary clothing in the United States, under existing law to-day, there will not be any increase, and I can prove it to the Senator.

Later on the following colloquy took place:

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator says to me and to this body that we are proceeding to increase the protective duty upon raw wool, and consequently the compensatory duties upon the manufactured articles, but that there will not be any increase in the cost of clothing. That is absurd, and even a child would not believe such a proposition as that.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator misunderstood me. I did not say there was not any increase.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I asked the Senator what, in his opinion, would be the increased cost of a suit of clothes. He said not anything. Then I say to him that we are proceeding to increase the duty upon raw wool, and consequently the compensatory duties to the manufacturers, and he has the hardihood to say it will have no effect at all upon the consuming public.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator certainly did not understand what I said.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Perhaps I did not. I will give the Senator another chance.

Mr. SMOOT. I said that on the general run of clothing worn by men throughout the United States, under the existing rates, there is no increase.

In other language the Senator from Utah reiterated the statement that there would be no increase in the cost of clothing to the consumers. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], in discussing the effect of the rates of duty on raw wool upon the increased cost of clothing to the consumers, made this statement; and I quote now from page 10566 of the RECORD of date July 22:

You talk about raising the price of woolen goods. The duty to-day is 45 cents a pound upon the scoured content of the wool. The duty under the pending bill is 33 cents a pound, or 12 cents a pound less. Then, in God's name, how can any man claim that reducing the tariff 12 cents a pound upon the scoured content is going to increase the cost of woolen goods?

It is not going to affect the price of the woolen goods. The price of those goods is coming down. It is bound to come down.

I have not the time to quote from statements of a similar character made by other Senators upon the other side of the Chamber, but all of us will recall that again and again it was claimed in this Chamber that the tariff rates that were levied in that bill would not result in increasing substantially prices to the consumers in America. Particularly was the claim made by those advocating the high rates upon wool.

Then Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER], when he was presented with some figures by leading clothing manufacturers of that State, claiming that the increased cost of a suit of clothes under the rates that it was proposed to levy in that bill would be about $5 per suit, and on overcoats from $5 to $10 each, wrote to the Tariff Commission, asking their opinion on the subject. They gave their opinion, and he gave his; and the opinion of the Senator from New York was that the increased price to the consumer as a result of the rate of 33 cents per pound on raw wool would be 92 cents on a suit of clothes, and $1.71 upon an overcoat. The Tariff Commission claimed a much higher increase but the Senator from New York rejected their estimates.

Mr. President, the Daily News Record, a newspaper published in the city of New York, nonpartisan, without any editorial policy, confining itself to furnishing the trade, particularly the textile trade, with accurate and full information about the textile business and the prices of textiles, states that yesterday the American Woolen Co. opened its samples of woolen and worsted goods and announced its prices. The American Woolen Co. controls 25 per cent of all the woolens and worsteds manufactured in America. It is the leader in fixing prices of woolen and worsted cloths, and all the independent companies wait until it sets the price, and they follow with the same price. That is not disputed. Yesterday the prices were fixed upon woolen cloths and worsteds, the first prices announced since the tariff law was passed in September, and the American public now know somewhat the effect of the high tariff duty levied in that act upon raw wool.

This newspaper states that 50 leading worsted staples show an advance of 12½ per cent over the fall line of last year. It further states that staple overcoatings have advanced about 16 per cent. The advance in the price of staple worsteds is from 5 to 55 cents per yard. The class of worsteds and woolens that were displayed yesterday for the first time to the manufacturers of clothing, who then and there were present to place their orders for cloths from which to make up clothing that will be sold to the American consumers next fall, were the goods that go into overcoats only. I am not now talking about suitings. At that price and sample opening yesterday the clothing manufacturers of the country were asked by representatives of the press to make comment upon the increased prices and the result of the increased prices in the increased cost of clothing to the American consumers.

I now read from a statement contained in this paper, the Daily News Record, under the title "What clothing manufacturers think":

In the face of the opening quotations of independent piece-goods operators . . . majority opinion was inclined to the belief that the prices represented the best that might be expected. The consumer will be called upon to pay an advance of $5 to $10 on his overcoat for next fall, on the basis of the American woolen quotations, the trade figures. As for suits, nobody was predicting anything, for the prices of cloths on which the bulk of next fall's suit business will be done have not yet been announced, it was said.

Five to ten dollars increase in the price of overcoats to the American consumers next fall!—a higher figure than anybody estimated on the floor of this Chamber; a higher price than Goldman, who was abused and vilified for his prophecy by Senators in this Chamber, estimated. The cheapest overcoat that the American man or boy will buy next year will cost him $5 more by reason of this tariff bill. The estimate which I made, representing the minority, was that the maximum would be about $5 on overcoats.

What answer are the majority going to make now to the assertions that were made by clothing manufacturers and the press at the opening of the prices of woolen and worsted cloths yesterday in the city of New York? Will they still claim that this high duty of 31 cents per pound on raw wool has not resulted in increasing prices to the consumer?

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I do.

Mr. DIAL. I should like to ask the Senator if he thinks the top has been reached yet? Perhaps they are just starting to increase prices. Possibly the top has not yet been reached.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator's observation is a very valuable one, because this newspaper states that the top has not been reached; it is only the beginning of the increases in the prices of overcoats and suits. Of course, the burdens of this iniquitous law will not be fully fixed upon the poor, unorganized consumers for months.

I want to read from this newspaper some views given out by the clothing manufacturers, who were there at the opening in large numbers, anxiously waiting to see what increase in prices there would be in the worsted and woolen cloth which they were to buy and send to their factories to make up into clothing to sell to the American people. Understand, there had been an increase in the fall prices as compared with the spring prices of 1922, and here is another increase in the prices that are made at this time which will become operative to the consumer when he buys his clothes next fall. Where, I ask, are our people to turn for relief from such tax burdens on their clothing? The prices are going up, up, up; the farmer is impoverished; wages are not increasing; the pay of the salaried men and women of this country, the clerks in the stores and the shops and banks, and the income of professional men remain undisturbed. There is no increase to meet this increase in the cost of clothing, and this statement can not be denied. These figures tell eloquently, as well as pathetically, by whom tariff duties are paid. Fifty samples were displayed, showing advances of from 5 to 55 cents per yard. What will be the story when it comes to blankets? What will be the story when it comes to woolen underwear? What will be the story when it comes to sweaters? What will be the story when it comes to woolen socks? Here is the proof. We had to wait months for it. Now we have it. Here are the figures, and here are the increases in prices. Here is what your iniquitous tariff law is going to do to the pocket-books of our people—pick them continuously and to the last farthing.

Returning to the news article and to the interviews that were collected from clothing manufacturers who were present, I quote:

One factor expressed the belief that buying would be curtailed as a result of the substantial advances recorded over prices for fall, of 1922, the fear of consumer purchases slowing up as a result of the increase that would be passed on to him was also expressed.

Even some of the manufacturers of clothing felt disturbed lest these increased prices, when passed on to the consumer, would slow up their business. Let me read further. This comment was expressed especially by those in touch with the retail end of the business:

Another prominent operator emphasized that indications pointed to the complete fulfillment of the prophecy made by William Goldman, of Cohen, Goldman & Co., before the present tariff law was passed, when he said that it would increase the price of clothing to the consumer between $5 and $10.

Mr. Goldman himself, when interviewed, said that the prices reflected the opinion generally expressed throughout the trade as of January 1, though more optimistic expressions have been commonly heard recently. Regarding the increase that the prices would necessitate at wholesale and retail, Mr. Goldman said:

"The advance on an all-wool ulster-raglan type overcoat at 30 to 32 ounce weight at wholesale will vary according to the maker and according to the way it is trimmed and made, from $3.50 to $7, or from $5 to $10 at retail, over last year."

To the retailer the increase is from $3.50 to $7, to the consumer the increase is from $5 to $10. I quote Mr. Goldman further:

Fabrics that contained reworked wool will show an advance of about $2.50 to $4 at wholesale, or from about $4 to $6 at retail.

Even the clothing of the poor, made with reworked wool, is to be increased from $4 to $6. Mr. Goldman said further:

It is to be borne in mind that in all of these calculations I have taken into account not only the increases in the cost of cloth but the increased cost of trimmings and also a slightly more liberal markup.

I would say this: That on a basis of the openings I do not believe that the present market for wool is fully reflected.

That confirms the observation made by the Senator from South Carolina.

I believe that the mills, if they had to figure their wools on the basis of the present market, would have to get somewhat more for their goods. This is surely true of the staple suitings that are open, but it would be different yet to forecast the advance in suitings until fancy suitings on which the bulk of the business is done, both in wool and worsteds, are open.

The prices of staples alone were opened yesterday. The prices of fancy suitings have not yet been made known, and it is fancy suitings that are used largely in the making up of suits of clothes.

We will all be interested in hearing what the Senator from Utah has to say. I am sorry the Senator, who is here now, was not in the Chamber when I quoted his words from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD used on this floor last July, when he said that there would be no increased prices reflected in the cost of clothing.

Mr. SMOOT. I said there should not be; I did not state there would not be.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator said there should not be?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I have quoted the Senator's exact words. Does the Senator still think there should not be?

Mr. SMOOT. Absolutely.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. So the Senator says that either the manufacturers or the clothiers are profiteering, and the increase in tariff duties is not responsible. Then I ask him, as a good Republican, as a man who loves his party, and his country more, to offer a resolution to investigate the increased cost of woolen cloth and woolen goods, and find out if it is an effort of these manufacturers and clothiers to profiteer upon the American people, and is not an honest increase due to their having to pay a higher price for the raw wool which goes into the manufacture of clothing.

Mr. President, I am not going to prolong the discussion. I want to give the Senator plenty of time, but I do want to hear from him. I do want to have him make some explanation about this. The country wants to hear it. I know he is disturbed about it.

Mr. SMOOT. Not in the least.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. He does not have to make the explanation to-day if he does not want to, but he must face the fact that there has been this increase and that there will be an increase of from $5 to $10 in the price of overcoats. I repeat, it is due either to the tariff upon raw wool or to the spirit to profiteer upon the part of the manufacturers of this country, whose cause nobody has championed more insistently than has the Senator from Utah. He must take his choice. The increase is due to either his high tariff or to the fact that his friends the manufacturers are proceeding to extort this increased price from the American public.

I want to apologize to the Senator from Colorado, who has charge of the pending bill, for injecting these remarks at this time. I know the subject is somewhat foreign to the bill under discussion, but I knew that the Senator from Utah especially would be interested in the information which I have given to the Senate, as conveyed through the press of New York this morning. I wait with very much interest the denial of the press reports or the explanation as to why the American public must pay from $5 to $10 more for their overcoats next fall.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I am not at all disturbed by the injection of the interesting remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts. We expect such interruptions.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Not always from me.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I was called from the Chamber to a committee meeting, and I am sorry that I was not here when the Senator began his address; but I have heard enough of it to judge as to what he said before I arrived in the Chamber and the object of his remarks.

During the discussion of the tariff bill, when the Fordney-McCumber bill was before the Senate, I stated that, as far as the duty of 31 cents per pound on the scoured content of wool was concerned, there should be no increase in the price of cloth. I maintain that to be an absolute fact to-day. The duty that was paid upon clothing wools before the Fordney-McCumber bill passed was higher than the duty provided in that bill, and I defy any living soul to say that it was not. I will let the Tariff Commission themselves be witnesses.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Of course there is no dispute that at the time the McCumber-Fordney tariff law was enacted there was upon the statute books the emergency tariff law in which the duty upon wool was higher than that named in the McCumber bill. It is also true that that law was only upon the statute books about a year, and that in anticipation of its enactment the woolen manufacturers of the country filled their storehouses. There was little increase in the price of wool during that time, and the law did not, in fact, become operative, because of business depression and the inclination of the wool trade to hold off buying new stock until the permanent tariff was enacted.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the figures contradict that statement from beginning to end.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. While the McCumber tariff law lowered the rate somewhat upon wool, in view of the embargo joker contained in the emergency tariff law, yet it increased the cost of wool greatly, for we had no duty for 10 years before the emergency tariff law on raw wool. I ask the Senator how he explains the increased cost of overcoats, when he claims that his tariff bill reduced the rates upon raw wool?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, that is so easy to answer that it seems to me a Senator who comes from a State that produces overcoatings, and is so interested in the subject, would never have asked the question. Can a cotton manufacturer make cotton cloths with cotton at 28.9 cents, the price of cotton yesterday, as cheaply as he can with cotton at 13 cents? I do not ask the Senator from Massachusetts to take the price of wools here in the United States to-day and compare them with the price the day we passed the McCumber bill. Let him take the markets of the world; take the London market, where most of these wools are purchased, and he will see the reason why the cloth is higher. It is not on account of the tariff.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. That has nothing to do with the increase?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; the increased world price of wool has something to do with the increase. The Senator knows they have increased, and the Senator knows they have not increased to equal five and ten dollars a suit because of any tariff or because of the increased price of wool, and I am going to show the Senator that that is true.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Does the Senator deny the fact that at the opening yesterday of the American Woolen Co. samples there was shown to be a substantial increase in the price of woolen cloths?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly the Senator does not deny that. It is reported the increase on clothes was about 12 per cent.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator says it is not due to the tariff duty levied upon wool in the McCumber bill. Then, I ask him to what it is due?

Mr. SMOOT. I will tell the Senator in a few minutes the cause of it. The price of wool to-day, as compared with the price of wool when the McCumber tariff law went into effect, will make, perhaps, two and a half to three dollars difference in a suit of clothes.

The Senator has read a statement to the effect that it makes a difference of $10 in the price of the wool in an overcoat. Does it? There are 4 yards of cloth in an overcoat. The cloth was 32 ounces per yard, according to the article as read. Being 2 pounds to the yard, 4 yards would make 8 pounds, and 8 pounds at $1.25 a pound is $10, and thus far not the tariff on the wool but the cost of the wool in an overcoat, if the coat is all wool. Mighty few overcoats made in this country or any other country are all virgin wool. Most of them are made in part of reworked wool, as the Senator knows.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Will the Senator permit me to ask him this question: When a manufacturer increases the price of his product it is due usually to one of three things, is it not, a desire for more profits, an increase in the price of labor, or an increase in the cost of raw material. Am I correct in that proposition?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; that is true in the main.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I am claiming that the increase in the price of woolen cloths, as announced yesterday in New York, is due to an increase in the price of raw wool to the woolen manufacturer, caused in fact by the high tariff duties on wool, and the Senator says it is not.

Mr. SMOOT. No; I did not say any such thing.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Then we agree.

Mr. SMOOT. I say that to-day in the markets of the world wool is higher than it was at the time the Senator referred to, and the Senator will admit it; just the same as cotton is higher to-day.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. Did the increased tariff on raw wool have anything to do with the increased price of wool?

Mr. SMOOT. There was a decrease in the rate of duty on wool in the present tariff act.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. A decrease in the rate fixed by the emergency tariff law, which was enacted for a limited time and which preceded only by a few weeks the drafting of the permanent tariff law we are now operating under.

Mr. ROBINSON. Oh, yes; over the emergency tariff act.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Massachusetts knows that during the time the emergency tariff act was in effect they had to purchase wool for a light-weight season and for a heavyweight season, and those were the prices which they compare now with present prices, and therefore the tariff rate now should be compared with the tariff rates upon the wools of which the cloth was made.

Mr. ROBINSON. Of course, the object of the high tariff on raw wool was to increase the price of raw wool?

Mr. SMOOT. Some duties are, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON. Any protective duty.

Mr. SMOOT. I mean on articles where there is not enough produced in the country to fill all the wants of the consumers. I do not mean to say that all the rates of duty are added to the price of the article. I have in my desk clippings from English publications in which it is stated that upon articles where increased rates of duty were imposed, the amount of the rate was deducted from the English price. I have a statement from the purchaser for Gimbel Bros. of dresses from Paris, that they were no more than they were before, that France had taken off the price the increased rate of duty, in other words, deducted from the price just the amount of the increase in the last tariff law.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Moses in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. Does the Senator contend that the emergency tariff rates were reflected in the price of raw wool?

Mr. SMOOT. Why, certainly they were, just the same as the present tariff rate is. The emergency tariff rates saved the wool producer in this country.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator, of course, understood the Senator from Massachusetts to maintain that under the peculiar conditions which existed surrounding the trade and the length of time that statute was in force and the conditions under which it went into effect, the tariff under the emergency act was not fully reflected in the price of the raw material. I am asking if the Senator fully concurs in the view?

Mr. SMOOT. No; but let me say to the Senator that America does not produce much more than one-half the amount of wool she consumes. So any act of Congress could not be in force a year or more unless the rates proposed in the act would have a bearing upon the price of the goods during that time we had to import wool.

Mr. ROBINSON. If the supply of wool was such that importations were not imperative, it might be true that the rate might be increased indefinitely and for quite a period not reflect itself in the price of the material.

Mr. SMOOT. I admit there is no doubt about that, but what were the facts in the case? While the Fordney-McCumber law was under consideration in the Senate there was scarcely any wool actually imported into this country. There was 110,000,000 pounds of it brought here but held in bond until the Fordney-McCumber tariff law went into effect. Why was that done? It was because the rates were just a little more than half the emergency tariff rate on clothing wool. In other words, under the emergency tariff law the rate upon the scoured content of clothing wool shipped into this country was 55 cents. Under the Fordney-McCumber law it was reduced to 31 cents. That is why they piled up 110,000,000 pounds of wool in the bonded warehouses here and took it out of those warehouses after the tariff bill became a law.

I simply want the American people to understand that if there is any increase whatever upon the cloth from which the clothing and overcoats are made, whether it be cheap or whether it be the finest made in the land, it does not come on account of the tariff rate.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. From what does it come?

Mr. SMOOT. The reason that could be advanced comes from the fact of the increase in the price of wool in the markets of the world. I want to say to the Senator that some time or other the American people will understand that no tariff law will impose a cost upon clothing as great as all the wool costs with the tariff added. They can not get away with that fable forever. It is impossible. I say now that the American people will sooner or later understand that if it takes 4 pounds of wool to make the cloth in a suit of clothes and that the wool costs $1.25 with the tariff included, then all of the wool in a suit of clothes, including the tariff, amounts to only $5, and if it were given to them—

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Does the Senator claim that the clothing manufacturers are profiteering?

Mr. SMOOT. That I can not say. I do not know what their prices are. I have not seen the samples.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Either the clothing manufacturers or the woolen manufacturers are profiteering, and if they are I charge the Senator and his party with the responsibility, because they have increased the protective duty levied in favor of the clothing manufacturer and also the manufacturer of woolen cloth.

Mr. SMOOT. That has nothing to do with the proposition previously made by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. It is not competition from abroad.

Mr. SMOOT. Competition where?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Competition from abroad.

Mr. SMOOT. All there is of competition in clothing, the Senator—

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. There is not any, because the duties have been so high they could not come in. The duties upon clothing and upon woolen cloth coming into this country have been so high that there has been a monopoly here in the clothing manufacturing business and the woolen and worsted woven-cloth industry, and the Senator knows it.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator knows nothing of the kind. The manufacturer in this country pays his duty upon the wool, and with the duty he has to compete, of course, with the foreign country, but where is there a country on earth that makes ready-made clothing as cheaply as we do in this country? Why, the duty was not placed on manufactured clothing, as I said to the Senator time and time again upon the floor of the Senate, because of a need of protection. He knows it. He knows that Kirshbaum, Kuppenheimer, the Royal Tailors, and similar manufacturers can manufacture ready-made clothing as cheaply as any place in all the world. The only reason why the duty was placed upon it was to catch these—

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The wealthy class who import fancy clothing.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I will use the term "highbrows." They are not satisfied with wearing clothing made in America; they must have it from England or Scotland. I wanted them to pay something for the privilege. That does not cost the American people one cent; and if we could get some of the money out of them to help pay the expenses of the Government, that is what I wanted to do. I think the American people approve of it. I think when I get into a state of mind that I can not wear a piece of cloth made in America, and I want a certain Scotch plaid or Scotch tweed, I ought to pay for it.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an inquiry?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I understood the Senator to say that he wants the American people to understand that the reason for the increase in the price of woolen cloth and clothing is due to the world-wide increase in the price of wool?

Mr. SMOOT. I do in part.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Am I right in the statement?

Mr. SMOOT. I think that is a part of it.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Then I ask, if that is true, does not the Senator think the tariff does not help the American farmer in increasing the price of wool?

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, yes; it does.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. It is the world market that has made the price go up, and not the tariff, according to the logic of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. The tariff is less to-day than it was before September 22 last; the day the present act became effective. If we produce in the United States all the wool that could be consumed in the United States, then the Senator's statement would be correct.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Does the tariff affect the price to the American wool grower?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly it does.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Is not that paid ultimately by the consumer?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; to the amount of the tariff or approximately so.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. How much is it in an overcoat?

Mr. SMOOT. It is not paid in the form in which the Senator said it was.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. But the Senator will admit it finally.

Mr. SMOOT. The rate now is 31 cents a pound on scoured wool. If there were four pounds of wool in a suit of clothes, that would be $1.24 per suit. If every cent of it was reflected in the suit of clothes, so far as that is concerned, it would only be $1.24. I ask any Senator here if he would say that is not true? But the good people of America have been led to believe, through Goldman and his clique, that the wool grower was the man who was getting it. They had figures here to prove that the duty upon wool cost the American consumer something like $275,000,000, but the fact was at the same time all of the wool that was raised in America did not cost over $75,000,000. But they repeated it over and over again, and the Senator from Massachusetts seems to have taken it upon himself to try to convince the American people it is true.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I wanted to emphasize the fact that Goldman got some confirmatory testimony yesterday from the prices quoted by the American Woolen Co. I think his prophecies were pretty well confirmed.

Mr. SMOOT. There is not a word in the article as read that says anything about the price of wool.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. In the New York Daily Record?

Mr. SMOOT. I mean the increased price of wool in the world market.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I was talking about the increased price of woolen cloth and of clothing, and not of wool.

Mr. SMOOT. The increased price of cloth is reflected by the increased price of wool and the increase in the world wool price has nothing whatever to do with what the tariff upon wool costs in a suit of clothes.

Mr. President, I do not know whether it is worth while to say anything more upon the subject.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. We will have some more to say later when the prices on the worsteds and the woolen suitings are announced.

Mr. SMOOT. I will add, however, while we are on the subject, that I have here the daily statement of the United States Treasury for January 19, 1923. In looking at one particular item I am reminded of the fact that the Senator from Massachusetts stood upon the other side of the Chamber, week in and week out, month in and month out, claiming that if the Fordney-McCumber bill passed it meant the closing of the ports for all importations of goods into the United States. Has it proven so? Let us see. Do not take my word for it. Take nobody's word except that of the Secretary of the Treasury as to the amount of money that has been received.

The customs receipts up until the 19th of this month have been $276,766,391.37. For the corresponding period of the preceding year the amount collected was $164,829,465.07. In other words there have been importations into the United States upon which tariff duties were collected that went into the Treasury of the United States amounting to $112,000,000 more this year than during the corresponding period last year. The law went into effect September 22, 1922. So all the dire predictions have fallen to the ground, as we said they would.

On the other hand, it was claimed by our Democratic spellbinders it would be impossible for us to export goods as soon as the tariff law went into effect. What are the facts?

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GLASS. Is the Senator seriously contending that under a high tariff our imports are greater than under a low tariff?

Mr. SMOOT. I think generally they are greater in quantity under a low tariff; I am quite sure they are; but I want to say to the Senator that up to the present time, in the operation of the present tariff law, the statistics and the comparisons do not show that to be the fact.

Mr. GLASS. That does not signify anything, as the Senator knows.

Mr. SMOOT. It signifies that all the statements which were made on the other side of the Chamber as to the meagerness of the revenue which would be collected, and as to drying up the resources of the Government, if the bill went into effect, have proved to be unfounded.

Mr. GLASS. The Senator had better wait until the first year of the operation of the law has passed, and not merely take a month or two after the bill has gone into effect.

Mr. SMOOT. It is not a question of a month or two. Nearly seven months of the fiscal year have elapsed, and while the new tariff act has not been in operation all of that time, the emergency tariff act was in operation before the new tariff act went into effect, and the revenues have been increasing all the time. So far as I am concerned, Mr. President, I believe that every prediction that was made on this side of the Chamber for the bill is going to be fulfilled beyond question by the revenue which the Treasury will derive from imports; and I trust that our exports will remain as great in volume as they are to-day.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the pending bill if it is his intention to ask the Senate to take a recess very soon?

Mr. PHIPPS. It was the intention to take a recess at the conclusion of the present discussion.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I inquire if the Senator from Utah has concluded?

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to complete what I was about to say when interrupted. I should like to finish that thought; that is all.

In 1913, the year before the World War, our exports were $2,488,018,292, whereas our exports for 1922—and I am referring to calendar years, not fiscal years—were $3,831,516,735. That is a comparison of our exports for the years named.

BERTHA N. RICH.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 4114) for the relief of Bertha N. Rich. The consideration of the bill was interrupted this morning by the call for the unfinished business.

Mr. HEFLIN. What is the purpose of the bill?

Mr. McKELLAR. I should like to know what the bill provides.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It is a bill reported by the Committee on Claims to pay remuneration to a woman whose husband was killed by the discharge of a defective machine gun in the hands of the Army at a recruiting office at the Trenton State fair.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator not to request consideration for the bill at this time, as I desire to secure some information in regard to it. I will have the information here to-morrow, and I shall then have no objection to the bill being considered.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I merely want to say to the Senator that the case involved is one of the most deplorable that has ever come to my notice, and a great deal of criticism has been leveled at me because I have not pressed the measure. I am desirous to see that justice be done this poor woman. Unless the bill may be passed within a reasonable time, we will not be able to secure action on it by the House. In the few weeks' time remaining of the present session I should like very much to have the Senate consider and act upon the bill; and I hope I may be allowed to bring it before the Senate and secure its passage.

Mr. SMOOT. I will have no objection against the consideration of the bill to-morrow.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. What objection has the Senator to the bill?

Mr. SMOOT. First, I have objection to the amount carried by the bill; and, second, I desire to know something in relation to the responsibility of the Government.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. If the Senator wants to ask any questions, I have all of the evidence here. I have made a careful investigation of the case.

Mr. SMOOT. I have read the report in full.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Has the Senator read the evidence?

Mr. SMOOT. I have not read the evidence; but, as I have stated, I have read the report.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I have the evidence all here.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator the character of the bill.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It is a bill reported by the Committee on Claims proposing to appropriate $15,000 as compensation to a poor woman whose husband was killed by the accidental discharge of a machine gun in the hands of a United States officer.

Mr. HEFLIN. Has it been unanimously reported by the committee?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It has been unanimously reported by the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection has been made to the consideration of the bill.

THE MAKING OF TARIFFS.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I have before me an able and illuminating article written by William S. Culbertson, of the United States Tariff Commission, printed in the January issue of the Yale Review, on the making of tariffs. I know it will be of interest to the Congress and to the people, and I ask unanimous consent that the article may be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The article referred to is as follows:

THE MAKING OF TARIFFS.

(By William S. Culbertson.)

Tariff making by Congress presents enormous difficulties. These difficulties are technical, economic, and political. They increase from decade to decade, and their interaction becomes increasingly complex, if not dangerous. They were dramatically forced upon our minds during the general revision which came to a close on September 21, when the President signed the tariff act of 1922. For about 18 months Congress had struggled with the making of this law. Over 10,000 pages of "information" for the committees of Congress were printed, and millions of dollars were expended directly on the revision of the tariff. There were long hearings, committee conferences, and debates. Manufacturers, farmers, stock raisers, miners, lumbermen, publishers, importers, representatives of department stores and mail-order houses, and consumers descended upon Washington to press their claims on Members of Congress in open hearings and private interviews. Some prophesied disaster if rates were not increased; others with equal zeal urged low duties or free trade for the articles in which they were personally interested. Floods of letters, briefs, and telegrams were sent by those who attempted to interpret the needs of special economic groups or pointed out the political consequence of this or that decision by the tariff makers.

All this controversy seriously diverted the attention of Congress from the consideration of other pressing problems. Those who expect to benefit from the tariff revision are not the only persons who have chafed at the delay in the enactment of the tariff act. Dissatisfaction has been freely expressed. There has been fruitless denunciation of "lobbies," and some cheap criticism of individuals. These profit little. Criticism should be directed not against our political leaders, who have worked devotedly and conscientiously, but against the traditional system which they felt themselves bound to follow. The difficulty with this system is not that private "interests" seek to present their claims. Under our form of government this is inevitable. Private parties are entitled to present their points of view and to produce information which they believe to be relevant. Moreover, they are an almost indispensable source of information. If the system by which a tariff law is made does not provide a regular channel and an orderly procedure for the presentation of the facts by the interested parties, they will find some means to bring their case before those vested with the power of final decision. An appreciation of this situation makes obvious the futility of talk about private interests "lobbying" in the Capitol and has directed attention to the improvement of the method of tariff making.

Impetus was given to this movement by a number of factors. At the outset a tariff revision was recognized as involving questions of general policy of the utmost importance which Congress, and Congress alone, could determine. Any modification of the tariff-making process must recognize this fundamental principle. The tariff is not a narrow subject. It affects every phase of our economic life. Considered from the standpoint of revenue, it becomes a fiscal problem and raises many questions of public finance. Viewed from the standpoint of the producer, it becomes an industrial problem and requires a careful analysis of all the factors which relate to the actual and potential competitive strength of our many industries. Considered from the standpoint of the consumer, it raises the questions of the incidence of taxation, of the cost of living, and of distribution. Viewed from the standpoint of our foreign relations, it presents some of the most complex and difficult questions in the field of international commercial policy. In 1921-22 there were added to these aspects of the tariff question problems not previously encountered. We had emphasized, as never before, for example, the interest of our exporters of manufactured goods and of our financial groups in tariff legislation.

Difficulties in tariff making, however, have not resulted from the determination of general policy but from the details of rate making, for which Members of Congress, except in rare cases, have no time or aptitude. The framing of a wise tariff law requires, in addition to judgment and common sense, accurate statistical and technical knowledge upon the thousands and thousands of issues which arise at every turn in the making of the bill. To vote intelligently on the tariff a Congressman must distinguish between raw silk, thrown silk, spun silk, and artificial silk; between crêpe de Chine, georgette, and habutai; between tapestries, pile fabrics, and damasks. He must understand "cloths woven with eight or more harnesses, or with Jacquard, lappet, or swivel attachments." He must know the quality and quantity of manganese ore produced in the United States and estimate the likelihood of an increase or decrease in production. He must differentiate crocus, tulip, and hyacinth bulbs. He must know the weight of nutshells and how much cowhide there is in a pair of shoes whose uppers are of kid. He must know the use of pieces of glass of areas respectively greater and less than 144 square inches; and he must have similar information about the 4,000 different articles mentioned in the tariff. Otherwise he must either make a guess at the proper rates or accept the suggestions of interested parties. A vast amount of information of the nature just indicated is needed in making a tariff by any other method than simply asking the parties what rate they would like. Congress must depend upon outside sources for this information. The Tariff Commission stands ready to provide it, but under the old system there was no assurance that Congress would give it serious consideration in the face of political pressure from the interested groups.

The tendency is toward greater complexity in tariff making. This is an inevitable consequence of our expanding population and of the growing intricacy of commercial and industrial life both in the United States and in competing foreign countries. A hasty survey of the results of our Federal census is sufficiently impressive, but the great and growing diversity of American industrial life is not fully appreciated until it is analyzed in detail. In the field of the tariff particularly it is frequently not the large-scale industries which present problems; it is the new and small industries, whose products may be of extremely small value but whose significance is very great in the industrial life of the country. The stimulus of the war of 1914-1918 to American industry was very great. Products never before produced in this country are now produced in substantial quantities. New industries have sprung up and are presenting in a new form the old industry argument for protection. A number of these new industries are also so-called "key" or essential industries, the encouragement and maintenance of which might be justified on the grounds of national self-sufficiency. As materials which have received attention for the first time, or which for the first time have presented serious problems, may be mentioned cerium, molybdenum, manganese, tungsten, ductile tantalum, and other metals used in steel and nickel alloys. The increasing diversification of American agriculture and the development of more intensive types of production have brought to the front as tariff issues semitropical fruits and nuts, including peanuts. Problems relatively unimportant a decade or two ago have become prominent in respect to dairy products, eggs and egg products, cereals and cereal products, canned and preserved fruits and vegetables, seeds, beans, and a considerable list of vegetable oils.

The consideration at one time in a general tariff revision of all these interests is a most serious defect of the old system. The merits of particular cases are often overlooked or disregarded. Politics and personal influence thrive. The deepest political forces in the country are brought into play, and they are frequently in conflict. Compromises must be reached in order to make any progress, and frequently the weight of decision is upon that side which can command the most effective political and personal influence.

An important factor, which finally turned the scale in the consideration of new methods in tariff making, was the unusual rapidity of the changes in economic conditions now taking place in the United States and in foreign countries. The conviction grew during the recent revision of the tariff that rates adequate to meet a given situation might soon prove either excessive or insufficient under conditions which might arise six months or a year later. There loomed the possibility that Congress would have to consider the tariff problem continuously. Economic conditions in the United States were fluctuating under the influence of postwar adjustments, including liquidation, in practically all of our industries. The changing of conditions, sufficiently serious in the United States, was infinitely more perplexing abroad. The situation abroad was created not only by the demoralized condition of European industry resulting from the war but also by the unbalanced budgets, the depreciation of currencies, and the failure to reach a decision in the reparations question. There seemed to be no stability whatever in European industry. The force of foreign competition, though equalized by the tariff at one moment, might suddenly be modified in a way to affect seriously American industry. Congress, in many instances fixed rates at a point which gave American industry the benefit of the doubt, but with the realization that rapidly changing conditions would probably necessitate readjustments in the future.

These conditions brought to the front as had never before been done the subject of our methods of tariff making. It was realized at the outset that the rule or principle or policy upon which tariff rates are to be determined is distinctly a legislative problem, and that a legislative function under no conditions can be delegated. The finding of the facts and the application of the rule or principle to these facts were, however, recognized as essentially administrative problems. Congress has attempted to gather facts by means of hearings, but more and more it has looked to such organizations as the Tariff Commission to furnish unbiased and impartial information. And in the actual framing of the bill the committees of Congress not infrequently, after hearing the interested parties on both sides, appealed to experts for assistance in applying to the facts as presented the principle upon which the bill was being framed. The tendency of tariff making has been toward Congress laying down the rule or guiding principle and entrusting to a few men the application of the rule to the facts. In a general way, therefore, the new method of tariff making embodied in section 315 of Title III of the tariff act of 1922 is a natural development.

Before we discuss this important step in tariff making a glance at past efforts in the same direction will disclose the tendencies. The desire of the American people to see better methods pursued has been summed up in the phrase, "The tariff should be taken out of politics." But constitutional objections and the absence of a practical plan made the early attempts to a large extent ineffective, although they were useful in laying a foundation. During the last half century several efforts at reform have been made. As far back as 1866 the need of expert advice was recognized in the law creating the office of the Commissioner of Revenue. In 1882 a temporary commission was created to prepare for the general tariff revision then imminent. It conducted no field investigations, but gathered its information through hearings, much as do committees of Congress. Not until 1909 was an attempt made to establish a permanent board with an expert staff ready at all times to advise on tariff subjects. A minor clause in the tariff act of 1909 authorized the President "to employ such persons as may be required" to assist him in administering the maximum and minimum provisions of that law. About the "persons" appointed grew up the Taft Tariff Board, which did valuable pioneer work in investigating costs of production. Less direct, but nevertheless just as real, evidence of the desire for improved methods in tariff making was the cost of production study of the Department of Labor under the act of June 13, 1888, and of the Cost of Production Division of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce from August, 1912, when the tariff board was discontinued, to April, 1917, when the present Tariff Commission was organized with broad investigational powers but with no right to determine or even to recommend tariff rates.

These attempts have been useful and cumulative in experience, but they had little effect upon the actual making of rates because they stopped with the finding of facts. They were predicated on the erroneous theory that if long columns of figures and other statistical data were laid before Congress the conclusion would be obvious to all. Accurate information is, of course, desirable. During the revision of 1920-1922 Congress had more than ever before—not, indeed, all that could be desired but much more than it had time to digest. But tariff making is not a matter of mathematics or statistics solely; it is a matter of common sense and judgment. The way to reform lies not in more general investigations and reports of findings for the use of Congress, but in the vesting of the power in the Executive to find the facts in particular cases and to fix a rate which those facts warrant under a rule laid down by Congress.

And this is precisely what the elastic provision of the new tariff act does. It therefore represents a distinct departure in the United States from former tariff-making methods. The President has spoken of it as the "greatest contribution toward progress in tariff making in a century." Under it the President has power to adjust upward or downward individual tariff rates after an investigation by the Tariff Commission has shown that this action is necessary to equalize "the differences in costs of production in the United States and the principal competing country." He may also change the classification of articles specified in the act, and, in the case of articles subject to ad valorem duties, when it seems to meet the requirements of the law more exactly, he may, without increasing the rate, change the basis for the assessment of an ad valorem duty by substituting the selling price of the similar competitive American article for the value of goods in the principal market of the country whence exported at the time of exportation. This emergency power over valuation and the duties on coal-tar dyes are, it may be noted in passing, all that is left in the act as a result of the extensive propaganda for American valuation. Certain limitations are placed on the President's power, as, for example, that no rate can be increased or decreased more than 50 per cent of the rate fixed by law; otherwise his power is plenary. Whenever an investigation results in the finding of facts which warrant a change under the cost of production rule, the President may issue a proclamation changing the rate in question, and 30 days thereafter the new rate becomes effective at our customhouses.

The criticism is occasionally heard that costs of production can not be found, and that if they could be they would not form a sound basis for tariff making. Such criticism results either from ignorance or from a design to defeat scientific tariff methods. It has been pointed out that the application of the principle of equalizing the difference in costs of production might be used to justify tariff rates of any height. It seems to have been forgotten that common sense and judgment will be exercised in the application of this or any other rule laid down by Congress. No attempt will be made to make profitable the production of coffee in Maine! In fact, no such attempt can be made under the law, for Congress has already determined what articles are to be dutiable and has prohibited the transfer of an article from the free to the dutiable list. Congress also, by fixing a maximum limit of duties under the "flexible tariff" section, has prevented the maintenance of any industry which is really not adapted to the economic conditions of the United States.

The objection that costs of production are difficult to find is not so serious as it has been made out. In 1912 it was pointed out as a result of the experience of the tariff board that, while absolutely accurate finding of comparative international costs was not always practicable, it was possible "in the case of most staple articles of manufacture to determine the ratio of costs between two different countries."

Cost accounting is the only means by which certainty can be introduced into business organization. It presents no insuperable difficulties to industrial leaders. Difficult as it is to find costs of production, every manufacturer knows that the finding of them is the basis of successful business. Even now costs are determined generally with a degree of accuracy sufficient for the purpose of control and even as an aid in the fixing of prices. Costs as a matter of fact are no more uncertain nor do they vary more than industrial life as a whole. Variety and difference are inherent in the problem. Cost accounting is an attempt to measure scientifically the uncertainty and change in industrial life. To reject it would be to abandon the most effective means of measuring actual and potential competition. Considering the purpose for which Congress has laid down the rule, the term "cost of production" will undoubtedly be broadly construed. In determining these costs we shall take into consideration all conditions of production, including wages and other cost items, wholesale selling prices, and advantages and disadvantages in competition. This method will disclose, as no other can, the competitive strength of industries in the United States and competing foreign countries, and will thus provide a sufficiently accurate basis for tariff making.

To these comments concerning the cost of production it should be added that the new system of tariff making does not stand or fall upon the desirability or practicability of the cost of production principle. This principle, for the time being, embodies the policy of Congress. It is a principle upon which it is possible for Democrats and Republicans to agree. But, if for any reason, political or economic, it becomes desirable subsequently to change the rule which the Tariff Commission is to apply, this can be done without disturbing the new method of tariff making.

Uncertainty to business has been urged as another of the objections to this new power conferred upon the President. On the contrary, it is more likely that greater stability will result therefrom. Under the old system individual rates were practically never changed except as a part of a general revision. Nothing could be more disturbing to business than the long-drawn-out tariff controversy through which we have just passed. For a year and a half Congress has been working on the tariff, and business has been held in suspense. The alternative is an orderly method of procedure by which individual rates may be changed when conditions require. Under the new powers conferred upon the President it is not necessary to await a general revision of the tariff in order to obtain relief in the case of particular rates. Those interested in the tariff should welcome a measure which affords them adequate opportunity to be heard and to have individual rates modified to meet changing conditions without the serious upheaval which always accompanies a general revision of the tariff.

The new provision has been attacked on the ground that it transfers legislative power from Congress to the Executive. Careful consideration was given by Congress to the question of constitutionality, and it was agreed that judicial decisions point to the validity of the provision. Congress lays down a definite rule for the guidance of the Executive and leaves to the latter simply the finding of the facts and the application of the rule. The constitutional distinction was summed up in a quotation cited with approval by the United States Supreme Court, as follows: "The legislature can not delegate its power to make a law, but it can make a law to delegate a power to determine some fact or state of things upon which the law makes or intends to make its own action depend."

The law provides that all investigations under the new sections of the law are to be made by the United States Tariff Commission. Prior to this enactment, the duty of the commission was to make general investigations. It had no power whatever over rates and could offer to Congress no recommendations except those of a general character. It was granted extensive powers to obtain accurate information, particularly from the trades and industries affected with a tariff interest, and it developed a staff of men professionally equipped and technically trained for handling tariff problems. Thus the accumulation of a large body of carefully interpreted scientific facts was made possible. These general powers remain in the Tariff Commission; in fact, they have been greatly extended, and in addition the commission has now laid upon it the duty of investigating particular cases and of making specific recommendations which may result in a change of rate by presidential proclamation.

The commission has, as a result of these new responsibilities, completely reshaped its organization. Under the commission there are now four broad divisions: (a) The office of the chief investigator; (b) the office of the chief economist; (c) the legal division; (d) the secretary's office.

The secretary handles the routine business of the commission. To the legal division are referred questions of customs laws and procedure and any other legal question that may arise in the commission's work. General investigations which the commission may conduct under its general investigational powers will be supervised by the chief economist, and special investigations made necessary by the new powers vested in the President will be under the direction of the chief investigator.

The commission's organization under the direction of the chief economist and the chief investigator consists of a series of divisions each with a chief and other experts. These divisions deal with chemicals, pottery and glass, metals, wood and paper, sugar, agricultural products, textiles, leather, sundries, preferential tariffs and commercial treaties, and accounting. In addition, the commission has provided for the establishment of a New York office and for the conduct of investigations in foreign countries.

The work of the commission's staff is coordinated in an advisory board, which reports only to the commission and is under its immediate direction. The chief investigator is chairman of this board.

Its other members are the chief economist, a representative of the legal division, and the chief of the division of the commission concerned in the subject matter under consideration at any given time.

The first step in defining the commission's procedure was the issue on October 7 of an Executive order by the President directing that all applications for investigation under the new provisions "be filed with or referred to the United States Tariff Commission for consideration and for such investigation as shall be in accordance with law and the public interest, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by such commission."

The commission has issued rules of procedure. They set forth how applications for investigations shall be made and under what conditions and in what manner the commission will conduct formal investigations upon which the President may change the tariff law. Anyone can apply for an investigation. The application need not be in any special form, but it must be in writing. It must also recite the relief sought and the reasons therefor. Obviously, the mere filing of an application does not obligate the commission to proceed formally. It will not order an investigation unless the application or a preliminary investigation discloses to its satisfaction that there are good and sufficient reasons for doing so under the law. The commission can order a formal investigation upon its own initiative as well as upon application. And it is not confined to the issue presented in an application; it may broaden, limit, or modify the issues to be determined.

When the commission finally decides to proceed formally with an investigation it will issue and publish a notice of the nature and scope of the investigation. Any person who then can show to the commission's satisfaction an interest in the subject matter of the investigation may enter his appearance in person or by a representative. He will be notified of public hearings and afforded opportunity to offer such testimony as may be deemed necessary for a full presentation of the facts. The commission's hearings will be open to the public unless the commission believes that a private conference is necessary to protect trade secrets or processes. Evidence submitted will be subject to verification from the books and records of the parties in interest. In conjunction with hearings the commission will conduct field investigations both in the United States and in foreign countries.

In all formal investigations the Tariff Commission's procedure will be judicial in character. Its rules provide for the attendance and examination of witnesses, the production of documentary evidence, the issuance of subpoenas, and the taking of depositions. The commissioner or investigator in charge of any investigation will summarize the hearings and the information obtained by field investigations and will prepare a report. Parties of record will be permitted, before they file their briefs, to examine this report as well as the record, except such portions as relate to trade secrets and processes.

Final hearings will, of course, be before the commission. Parties of record may file briefs, and in some cases may present oral arguments. The commission's findings will be in writing, and will be transmitted with the record to the President for his action.

This article, as will be evident, deals not with the merits or demerits of the rates of duty imposed by the tariff act of 1922, but only with the method—the process by which rates of duty are fixed. Obvious as are the needs for improvement in our system of tariff making, the elastic tariff provision will not be supported by certain groups in the United States. One group of opponents prefers to get its tariff claims accepted through political and personal pressure. Another consists of those politicians who traffic in such wares, and still another of those stationarily minded persons who are afraid to brush the cobwebs down for fear the ceiling will fall. The vast majority of Americans, however, believe in going forward in the improvement of our governmental machinery. The tariff-making methods heretofore in force do not command their confidence, and when they understand the new method thoroughly they will welcome a change which, while reserving to the legislative branch of the Government the determination of policy, will elevate the details of rate making above the level of personal and political influence and give it a judicial character. The present tariff act embodies this fundamental principle. If in operation it develops minor defects, they will be used by its opponents as an argument for discarding this fundamental principle and reverting to the old system. But, whatever the difficulties of administration and whatever minor modifications experience may show as necessary in the new system in the next few years, the act provides the only feasible method of reducing the political element in tariff making; and if the people will actively support it against the opposition which will develop its success is certain.

Perhaps not so fundamental as the provision just discussed, but closely resembling it in the power over rates which they give the President, are two other provisions of the act of 1922. In sections 316 and 317, as in section 315, Congress has prescribed general rules in accordance with which the President, acting upon the advice of the Tariff Commission, may order a change of rates. Method and procedure under these three sections are approximately the same, but the purposes are altogether distinct, and in its way section 317 is almost as revolutionary as is section 315. Section 317 directs our general commercial policy along new lines, whereas section 316 may be regarded as an extension of the principle embodied for many years in our tariff laws (section 303 of the present act), that the Executive shall determine the rate of countervailing duty to be levied to offset any bounties that foreign Governments may from time to time grant to the manufacturers or exporters of articles dutiable upon entry into the United States.

Section 316 applies what is in effect the system of countervailing duties throughout the field of unfair competition. It aims to protect American industry against all unfair methods of competition and unfair acts in the importation of goods. For many years, antidumping legislation has been recognized as a justifiable form of protection supplementary to tariff duties. The usual type of antidumping law, however, is not regarded as sufficiently broad to cover all unfair trade practices, or as sufficiently flexible to meet the unusual conditions of the present day. Section 316 extends to import trade practically the same prohibition against unfair methods of competition which the Federal Trade Commission act provides against unfair methods of competition in interstate trade. Under this section, additional duties may be imposed on the importations of any individual engaging in unfair price cutting, full line forcing, commercial bribery, or any other type of unfair competition; and if the unfair practices are of an aggravated character, the offending individual may be prohibited from importing goods into the United States. These provisions make it possible for the President to prevent unfair practices even when engaged in by individuals residing outside the jurisdiction of the United States. It is a difficult field, but it must be evident that in some such flexible provision as this lies the only hope of an effective protection of American industry against the variety and subtlety of attacks which may be included in the term "unfair competition."

The other feature of the new law is found in section 317 and is designed to aid American industry by protecting American export trade. Particularly since 1914 has our interest in international commercial policies increased. This interest has been stimulated by the rapid development of our export trade, by our growing dependence for raw materials upon foreign sources, particularly colonial sources, and by the increasing export of American capital and its investment in the development of the so-called economically backward parts of the world.

Before 1914 necessity did not force us as a nation to concern ourselves greatly with the protection of our overseas interests. We allowed our commercial treaty structure to become antiquated, and it is now ill adapted to the new conditions which confront us. We have not had a settled policy of tariff bargaining. Under the tariff acts of 1890 and 1897 we tried two methods of bargaining which, because of their meager results, were finally abandoned. In the recent tariff discussion these methods were considered and rejected. One method rejected was designed to provide "for special negotiations whereby exclusive concessions may be given in the American tariff in return for special concessions from foreign countries."

Offers to concede reductions in American tariff rates in return for reductions in foreign rates make a superficial appeal. They seem to arise from friendliness and to lead to a general moderation of tariff rates, but this view results from centering attention on single transactions. The experience of European countries during the last generation shows that the concessional method of tariff bargaining by its very nature leads to bickerings and to tariff wars. At best it results in concealed, if not open, discriminations against third countries. The outcome has been higher tariffs. Each country makes generous advances in rates to fortify its position for bargaining purposes; and the concessions which it grants are frequently, if not usually, less generous than the preliminary increases.

The other method rejected during the recent tariff discussion was designed to place in the hands of the President power to penalize the commerce of any foreign country which imposes on its imports, including those coming from the United States, duties which, in comparison with the duties imposed by the United States, he deems to be "higher and reciprocally unequal and unreasonable." Probably no more objectionable method of tariff bargaining than this has ever been suggested. The aim of this method is not, at least primarily, to remove discriminations, but to batter down tariff rates, equally applicable to all countries, which American export interests may regard as too high, but which the foreign country may think justified by its fiscal and industrial needs. From the beginning of our history we have been very insistent upon our right to impose any duties which we thought our domestic needs required. Frequently, foreign nations have objected to our high duties, but their claims have been denied. In view of this fact, it was inevitable that Congress would reject a method which was designed to employ penalty duties to force down the level of foreign tariffs. Furthermore, such a method was almost certain to lead to retaliation, and even when it did not provoke retaliation, the method was likely to be ineffective in opening foreign markets.

Congress finally adopted in section 317 a method of commercial negotiation that followed the precedents established by the maximum and minimum provision of the Payne-Aldrich Act which, to quote the conferees who finally shaped the act, "had for its purpose the obtaining of equality of treatment for American overseas commerce." "The United States offers under its tariff (section 317) equality of treatment to all nations and at the same time insists that foreign nations grant to our external commerce equality of treatment." In detail, this section empowers the President, when he deems it to be the public interest, to impose additional duties or even prohibition upon the whole or a part of the commerce of any foreign country that places the commerce of the United States at a disadvantage compared with the commerce of any other foreign country. The phraseology of the law is designed to secure real and not merely nominal equality of treatment. It is designed to secure the removal not only of open discriminations but of discriminations concealed in customs and sanitary regulations and in classifications.

This new section, while similar in principle to the penalty provision of the Payne-Aldrich Act, differs in method and also, in part, in object from its predecessor. In method the Payne-Aldrich provision was inflexible, clumsy, and unworkable. Under it the President may be said to have been debarred for practical purposes from recognizing any discrimination unless it were of sufficient magnitude to justify the imposition of an additional 25 per cent ad valorem upon all the products of the offending country. The law permitted no adjustment according to the nature of the discrimination against American trade or according to the nature of our imports from the offending country. Under the present flexible law, any country which continues to discriminate against American trade may find its trade suffering from exactly those penalties which will do it the greatest amount of harm with the least possible injury to American importing interests.

Obviously, the object of section 317 is to obtain for American commerce equal treatment in accordance with accepted standards of negotiation between nations, but it goes further and includes within its scope discriminations often referred to as of only domestic concern. Most serious from a standpoint of both trade and world peace are the systems of import and export preference which to-day characterize the colonial commercial policies of the United States, Great Britain, France, Italy, Spain, Portugal, and Japan. Preferential import duties are levied by mother countries to give home industries an advantage in colonial markets, and preferential export taxes are imposed to give home industries a preferential position in supplies of essential raw materials. So long as we maintain our policy of preference in the Philippines we are hardly in a position to penalize the colonial preferences of other nations. The term "foreign country" is, however, defined in section 317 to include dominions, colonies, protectorates, or other subdivisions of government wherein separate tariff rates are enforced. It can, therefore, no longer be said that Congress regards colonial preferences as "domestic questions."

An indiscriminate use of penalty duties against colonial preferences was probably not contemplated by Congress. The removal of systems of preference deeply embedded in the economic and political policies of countries may call for serious negotiations rather than for retaliatory steps which might result in trade wars. In this respect the significance of section 317 is that foreign nations can no longer ignore his views if the President raises with them some of the fundamental issues of international commercial policy. The world is drifting more and more toward commercial conflict. There is evident in many countries a desire to use commercial devices for the purpose of furthering narrow national interests. Nations are not looking ahead nor visualizing the situation which may result from every country pursuing a discriminatory policy in its commercial development. A wider application of the principle of the "open door," which is already a recognized part of America's international policy, will do much to stay the drift toward imperialistic and exclusive commercial policies. Much can be done by the negotiation of commercial treaties, but the most fundamental and serious of the commercial issues between nations to-day must be worked out in an international conference. Merely agreeing to grant equal access to markets and to sources of raw materials is not sufficient. Nations must cooperate to make their agreements effective. Too often the "open door" has been nominally accepted only to be evaded in practice. After all, there are some things which nations must do together. Nationalism, useful and essential in some fields, has its limitations. "In many ways," the President said, on October 11 1922, in his letter to Mr. MONDELL, "real protection comes from cooperation with other nations. The best intelligence of the day recognizes the need to encourage intimacy and understanding in the social, economic, and political family of nations."

We need prophets who can see clearly the dangers of economic rivalry between the nations and who will point the way of escape. It is a false nationalism which emphasizes self-interest to the point of destruction. Men and women will not love their nation less if they come to understand its place in the family of nations and to realize that the judicial settlement of disputes is the only road to security and progress. National control reaches a point sooner or later where it breaks down. Beyond this point national security depends on international security. Economic issues, such as the struggle for markets and raw materials, if not solved by genuine international cooperation, will destroy the nations. By adopting cooperation as a means of solving such world problems, a nation gives up nothing that is worth keeping, and it takes the only course which in the long run will preserve the finest features of nationality.

SALARY OF ALIEN PROPERTY CUSTODIAN.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have just received a letter from Col. Thomas W. Miller, Alien Property Custodian, in which he states:

In looking over the debate on the independent offices appropriations bill in Senate proceedings on January 22, page 2199, I note that Senator MCKELLAR, of Tennessee, asked if the salary of the Alien Property Custodian was not $10,000 a year, to which an affirmative reply was made by you.

I do not remember making the reply, although I heard one of the Senators on my right say he thought that was the amount; but, be that as it may, I participated in the discussion which followed. Colonel Miller proceeds in his letter to say:

I appreciate the great mass of detail you must carry in the position you occupy in the Senate. This is merely to advise you that my salary is $5,000 a year as fixed by statute. I took occasion to note the rest of your discussion with the Senator from Tennessee regarding minor matters pertaining to this office, and appreciate the manner in which you handled them.

Sincerely yours,

THOMAS W. MILLER,
Alien Property Custodian.

I merely desired to bring to the attention of the Senator from Tennessee and the Senate the contents of the letter received by me.

RECESS.

Mr. PHIPPS. I move that the Senate take a recess in accordance with the unanimous-consent agreement entered into earlier in the day.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate, under the order previously made, took a recess until to-morrow, Wednesday, January 24, 1923, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 23, 1923.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, the gates of Thy mercy are open day and night. Thy throne is not of iron, but of love. Thou art our Father and the path of duty is the path that leads to Thee. We bless Thee that, as Thy children, Thou dost give joy to life, elevation to our aims, sweetness to our experiences, and peace to our souls. This day let the way be bright and help us to walk more precisely in it. We thank Thee for the privileges, the opportunities, and the fellowships that make life useful and sweet. Safely direct, shape, and control our national life. Always may the influences of this assembly go out for the welfare and the happiness of all the people. In Thy name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

Mr. FAVROT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 11626.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. R. 11626. An act to extend the time for constructing a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near the City of Baton Rouge, La. The Senate amendments were read.
Mr. FAVROT. I move to concur in the Senate amendments. The motion was agreed to.

TAX-EXEMPT SECURITIES.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I understood there was a conference report to be presented.

The SPEAKER. It is not in yet.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the joint resolution H. J. Res. 314.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman from Iowa remember how much time there is left for general debate?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The timekeeper there can give it to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Iowa has 39 minutes and the gentleman from Texas 38 minutes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Has the gentleman considered the desirability for extending the time for general debate upon this very important matter?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Well, I thought possibly if the time was extended it would be better to extend it on the proposed amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] than on the general debate, if that would be equally satisfactory.

Mr. GARNER. I hope that the gentleman will ask that there be an hour on a side.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. There are some gentlemen very anxious to go away. Will the gentleman be satisfied by making it 45 minutes on a side?

Mr. GARNER. Additional time?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. No; that would increase the time to 45 minutes each, and some additional time, if the gentleman desires it, for discussion on his amendment.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman does not mean to say we are going to get through here in time for anybody to leave at 3 or 4 o'clock?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Well, I do not know; that may not be possible in any event. But I think it will be almost necessary to get through this evening.

Mr. GARNER. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman's amendment to the joint resolution will be pending.

Mr. GARNER. We can take up the entire day and have a vote by 5 o'clock. Let us have an hour on a side for general debate, even have three hours in all, and then take up the amendment. It is a short resolution, only covers one page.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, pending that motion, I ask unanimous consent that the time for general debate be extended so that each side have one hour.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the time for general debate be extended so that each side have one hour. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The question is on the motion of going into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division. The House divided, and there were—ayes 60, noes 40. So the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 314) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, with Mr. McARTHUR in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House Joint Resolution 314, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. J. Res. 314. Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the joint resolution be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the joint resolution be dispensed with. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman from Texas use some time?

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I thought the gentleman from Iowa was going to explain the provisions of his resolution. However, if he desires, I will proceed. Mr. Chairman, I want to take up five minutes' time for the purpose of calling the attention of the gentleman from Wyoming to what appears to be at least an inconsistency on his part. I am sure he does not intend to deceive anyone, because the leader of a great party ought not to deceive even Democrats, much less members of his own party. The gentleman from Wyoming the other day suggested the reason why he had not permitted a consideration of the Muscle Shoals proposition was that there was no chance of passing it in the Senate. Now, I suggested to the gentleman from Wyoming that he should not consider this pending resolution, because he knew it could not be considered and passed in the Senate.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER. In just a moment and then I will—and the gentleman from Wyoming in his heart knows that there is no chance for this resolution to be considered in the Senate, much less that it shall be passed. Now, how can he take the position before his Republican colleagues and make to them the excuse that the reason why he has not given Congress an opportunity to vote on Muscle Shoals is because the Senate could not consider and would not consider the legislation and pass it at this session, when at the same time he brings this resolution before the House for consideration? As I say, I hope he is not trying to deceive anybody, but undoubtedly he is a little bit inconsistent.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MONDELL. One of the minor reasons I gave when I expressed the view that it was not highly important that we should consider Muscle Shoals at this time was the fact that the Senate could not consider the Muscle Shoals matter at this session. But there were other reasons, and I gave them in advance of that reason. There are many other reasons why it is not highly important that we should consider Muscle Shoals at this time, compared with which the matter of the failure to consider it in the Senate is minor.

Mr. GARNER. Oh, Mr. Chairman, there is not a Member in this House who heard the gentleman from Wyoming and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] apologize for the fact that they were being whipped into line by their party on Muscle Shoals but knows it was an apology, used as an excuse for the Republican Party's failure to consider that bill. The Members know that they have failed to get an opportunity to consider the Muscle Shoals matter and vote on it for reasons other than that it will not be considered in the Senate.

Now he brings before you a measure that has not been discussed on the floor of the House except for one day, and he asks you to vote on the most important matter that has been brought before Congress at this session, considered from the standpoint of the interests of the General Government, and he brings it before you and presses for its consideration when he knows that there is no chance for its enactment by the Congress. It can not be considered in the Senate and it can not be passed there, and everybody knows it.

Mr. Chairman, I see my genial friend from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] has just arrived. His arrival suggests to me the remark that was made here the last time this measure was considered, when he told you he voted against it in committee and felt in his heart that it should not be passed, and that if he were a member of the Legislature of Michigan he would not support it; and when I asked him why he supported it here, his answer was he believed we should submit it to the States and let them vote on it, and thus relieve himself from the responsibility. I asked him if he was willing to support a proposition that has been presented by a prominent statesman in the Senate proposing the recall of decisions of the Supreme Court, and he said it was "bunk." [Laughter.] I am informed, however, that in the State of Michigan they have both the recall and the referendum.

I am informed, I say, by a Member from the State of Michigan that they have the referendum and the recall. I refer to Mr. JAMES, a Member of Congress from Michigan, who says he was chairman of the committee that reported the bill and passed it through the State Legislature of Michigan.

I do not think gentlemen should take the position that they will vote to submit an amendment merely to give the people of the States an opportunity to vote upon it. Members should take such a position as their conscience and intellect dictate. I undertake to say, Mr. Chairman, that if you vote on this amendment according to your intellect and your conscience and the impression you have had made on your judgment by the debate here, by the analysis of the amendment, this measure would not have a chance to get a majority, not one-third, much less two-thirds, in the House of Representatives. But the trouble is that while many of you have realized the importance of the proposition, and you believe that it should not be submitted to the States, that it is death to the States and dangerous to the Federal Government, yet you have gotten yourselves in the position where you think you should vote "yea" in order that you may transmit to the States the obligation you now have. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time, and I ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] to use his time.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that the committee do now rise.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. On that I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed Mr. GREEN of Iowa and Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee to act as tellers.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 30, noes 67.

The CHAIRMAN. So the committee declines to rise.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] says that in his opinion there is no possible chance of the Senate acting upon this measure if we send it to them. He may be right, although I hope he is not. But that fact, even if it be only a guess, should not absolve us from the duty of passing it here ourselves, for it is designed to remedy an evil, a great and growing evil, which, in my judgment, is not exceeded by any other that afflicts our body politic to-day.

Let me see if I can put in plain, simple language just what this evil is. Statistics show that something more than 7,000,000 people in this country earn an income somewhere between $20 and $200 a week. That would be an average, say, of $50 a week. Now let us try to visualize this class of persons as one single entity and imagine the transaction that takes place between that entity and the tax collector of the Government on tax day. That entity approaches the tax collector, and the tax collector says, "What was your income last year?" He says, "$2,500," and the tax collector says, "How did you get it?" He answers, "I earned it." "Oh, very well, if you earned it, step up to the counter and pay $275,000,000."

Now let us suppose that another entity, a small but ever-growing class of persons whose money is all invested in tax-exempt securities, is approached by the tax collector, who says, "How much money did you make last year?" He replies, "$25,000." "Well, how did you get it?" "Why, I got it from investments in certain things which the Constitution of the United States says are not taxable." "Very well," says the tax collector, "in that case you are immune and there is nothing to pay."

There is the whole proposition involved here. A man who earns his income or derives it from investment in any industrial enterprise, or something that gives employment to labor or produces things which are of vital interest to the American people, has to pay a tax, but the man who puts his money into nontaxable securities and whose only work is to deposit the check in his bank account is absolutely free from any taxation whatever.

The worst vice of it all is that slowly but surely earned incomes are paying more and more of the cost of government and unearned incomes are day by day getting rid of any tax whatever. The returns for this year show that men who earn their incomes are paying almost twice as much relatively of all the taxes as they were a year ago. That is utterly and absolutely vicious, gentlemen. There is no other country on the face of the earth that permits any such thing to exist. On the contrary, most enlightened countries discriminate in favor of earned incomes as opposed to unearned incomes. Great Britain does, France does, Japan does, and a number of other countries do.

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I beg the gentleman's pardon. My time is very short. I myself drafted a provision which for a time was incorporated in the committee's bill of the 1917 revenue law, which made a discrimination of 20 per cent in favor of earned incomes as opposed to unearned incomes, and the committee were for it unanimously in principle; but the trouble was we were informed by the Treasury Department that it could not be administered with their machinery, and it went out of the bill. I repeat that from no point of view can the proposition be justified for a moment that earned incomes should be taxed at a higher rate than unearned incomes. What has happened? In 1913, and, if I remember correctly, for some years previously, only something between $300,000,000 and $400,000,000 was borrowed every year by the States and their political subdivisions on an average. To-day the average is more than a billion and a half of dollars every year—five times what it used to be. No one here wants to hurt or to limit the borrowing capacity of the States for legitimate purposes, and the most that can be said against this proposed amendment in that regard is that it will restore the precise condition that existed in 1913 before the new income-tax system went into effect.

Now, you may say, "Why do these very rich men try to avoid taxes by putting their fortunes into these nontaxable securities?" It never occurred before the war. It did not occur during the war, because men were willing in those days to pay half or three-quarters of their incomes for the support of the Government in time of war, but it is not human nature to do that in time of peace.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. It is not hard to explain how rich men will put their money into securities, but it is most difficult to explain why all the rich men are in favor of taking this privilege away from themselves.

Mr. MACLAFFERTY. They are not.

Mr. GARNER. All that I have heard of are.

Mr. LONGWORTH. That is the first time I have heard that argument, and I should like to have the gentleman from Texas cite me such a case.

Mr. GARNER. I cite to the gentleman the Exchange National Bank of New York, the City National Bank of New York, the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mellon, and every other man like Mr. Kahn, of Kuhn, Loeb & Co., and every one of these wealthy men who has appeared in print on the subject, who is supposed to be holding these exempt securities, is in favor of the proposed amendment.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman from Texas well knows that the first two he mentioned have their money invested in active business, and they do not benefit by this tax exemption.

Mr. GARNER. I understand, then, that Mr. Mellon, who is supposed to be the second richest man in the United States, and Mr. Rockefeller, and Mr. Ford, and those people are engaged in active business, and therefore they are not concerned with this amendment!

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] may be in the confidence of Mr. Ford, who is possibly his candidate for the Presidency. I do not know. I am not in his or Mr. Ford's confidence. I assume that the position of Mr. Mellon, the Secretary of the Treasury, and he is in entire agreement with the President in his position, is in the interest of the people of the United States. Professor Seligman, a very distinguished scientist, a professor of political economy in Columbia University, who, I assume, is not attempting to dodge taxes, did not, I think, overestimate this evil and the situation that it is surely leading to when he said, before the Ways and Means Committee:

The issue of tax-exempt securities creates a class of nontaxable individuals that constitutes a fundamental infraction of democratic justice in taxation. In France, under the ancient régime, the clergy were not taxed, the nobility were not taxed, the lawyers were not taxed. It was this series of class exemptions and privileges which finally led to bring about the French Revolution. What we are doing at the present time is to create a class of privileged individuals, privileged not because of their theology, of their escutcheons, or their knowledge of the law, but privileged because of the amount of money they possess. That is the worst kind of privilege in a democratic community.

I do not think that Professor Seligman exaggerated the situation. If this continues much longer, gentlemen, we are going to break down absolutely our whole theory of the principle of a graduated income tax. It is as plain as the paper on the wall that the man whose income runs up to the high brackets and is subjected to a tax of more than 50 per cent, if he can put his money where it is not to be taxed at all he will do it. I have not the slightest question but that my friend, Mr. GARNER, an able attorney, if a rich client came to him whose estate was invested in 6 per cent industrial bonds, 6 per cent railroad bonds, and in 6 per cent farm mortgages, subject to a tax of 50 per cent, and he should ask my friend, Mr. GARNER, whether it would not be to his advantage to put that money into securities which would bring him 5 per cent, and on which there would be nothing to pay, that my friend from Texas would advise his client to do so at once.

Of course he would. There is nothing unpatriotic either in the lawyer to advise his client to put his money where it is not taxed as it is for the man himself in a time of peace. In order to net on an industrial bond what you can net on a nontaxable bond provided you are a very rich man and the tax goes into the high brackets, that bond would have to net you at least 12 per cent. There is no such thing in existence as a 12 per cent bond, but if there was here would be the situation: You would have to pay at least $200 to get that bond at all. In other words, for the very rich man a 5 per cent nontaxable bond is worth $200, and he can get it for $100. What is he going to do? Why, of course, he is going to put his money wherever he can in these tax-exempt securities.

As I say, the average yearly output has increased from between three and four hundred million dollars to a billion and a half dollars to-day. The amount outstanding is estimated to-day according to various estimates, somewhere between ten and eighteen billion dollars.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It lies within the power of any State to-day to prevent the issuance by itself of tax-exempt securities and the issuance of tax-exempt securities by subdivisions.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Why, of course, but what State is going to do that when they can under this system issue bonds in unlimited quantities for anything they please. That is one of the vices of the system. We are getting to the point where the political subdivisions of a State are getting to be absolutely reckless in the way that they spend money. In my own State in the last election there were two constitutional amendments before the people. One of them was to prohibit the issuing of bonds to pay current expenses of the government, and the other provided that no bonds could be issued to provide for a specific project extending for a longer period than the existence of the project. Both of these amendments were beaten by a large majority. No State is going to do what the gentleman from Tennessee suggests. On the contrary, the States are being encouraged by the bankers to issue as many bonds as possible.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Can I have three minutes more?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I yield three minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. LONGWORTH. In old days when the little town of Podunk wished to issue bonds its officials when they approached the banker had a hard time to be admitted to his presence. To-day these officials are welcomed with glee; they smoke the banker's cigars, and put their feet on his desk, so to speak, because the banker is anxious to sell all the bonds that he possibly can to his rich clients.

The fact is, gentlemen, if you consider this situation an evil, and it is undoubtedly the greatest evil that afflicts us to-day, there are but two alternatives to cure it. One of them is to reduce the surtaxes to a level where the very rich men are willing to leave their money in industrial enterprises and the other is to pass this amendment. We all know that it is utterly impossible in this Congress, and I assume in the next Congress, to very substantially lower the higher income taxes. So our only way, then, is to amend the Constitution, put this class of securities in the same class that every other security is in, so that the hole from which all this money which should flow into the Treasury is leaking out may be blocked up. And more than that and above that, to relieve that condition, utterly unjustifiable from any point of view, where the clergyman, the lawyer, the doctor, the small business man, are called upon to pay a heavy tax to the Government, and the rich man, who has millions locked up in State and municipal bonds, can enjoy his income without one stroke of work for the benefit of the people and be absolutely exempt from all taxes. [Applause.]

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. OLDFIELD] eight minutes.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am opposed to this resolution and shall vote against it, and will use the eight minutes allotted to me in telling why I am opposed to it. I attended the hearings of the committee and have given this question a great deal of study and thought. In the beginning I was rather inclined to support the resolution, but I find from the propaganda which came to members of the Ways and Means Committee and from the gentlemen who were backing the resolution, that I was forced to the conclusion—in fact, I think there is no doubt about it—that the very rich of the country are the ones who are favoring the resolution, and I believe I now know why. I know that that is what the propaganda indicates. One crowd that was most insistent in the propaganda was the Farm Mortgage Bankers' Association. I think they have written more letters and sent more briefs and arguments to the members of the Committee on Ways and Means than any other organization in the country. Of course, it is easy to understand why they would like to see this adopted, because they want to go on as they have always done, charging the farmers of the country 7, 8, and 10 per cent interest on farm-mortgage loans, and they want to kill off, if possible, the farm loan act.

The gentlemen who ask for this proposition seemed to me to be inconsistent, indeed. The report says that it grants a private subsidy to certain interests, and Mr. MILLS, of New York, one of the ablest Members on the Republican side, said that it meant a bonus to people who own and purchase these tax-exempt securities, and that it also meant a bonus to the States. I can not understand why a Republican who would support a ship-subsidy bonus would object to the States having that bonus, and yet the gentlemen who supported the ship-subsidy bonus are very much opposed to what they call a bonus to the various States, when they issue these tax-exempt securities. Here is the trouble with this proposition. It says that it encourages extravagance of governmental agencies.

The gentlemen who support this proposition do not want the various States and the subdivisions of the States to issue road bonds, school bonds, reclamation bonds, because those bonds come in competition with the great industrial bonds of the country who want to have a monopoly of the bond market of the country. If they would place in this resolution the proposition suggested by my friend from Texas [Mr. GARNER], we could all support it. I am not in favor of anybody getting out of paying his just proportion of the taxes. I was not in favor of reducing the high surtaxes on the rich or of lowering their taxes, but the majority of you gentlemen on the Republican side favored it; and I notice those same gentlemen are the most enthusiastic for this proposition. I opposed and the Democrats opposed and a great many of the Republicans opposed the repeal of the excess-profits tax, whereby we lost $450,000,000 a year in taxes from the great corporations of the country; but the very gentlemen who were in favor of repealing the excess-profits tax are urging this legislation, and they make it appear that they are urging it in the interest of the poor. In other words, they put themselves in the attitude of the rich coming to the Congress of the United States and urging something to their disadvantage and, on the contrary, to the advantage of the poor. I do not take much stock in that sort of argument; but under this resolution Congress could discriminate against the States, and the States could discriminate against the Federal Government by taxing the income of the Federal securities, by taxing the income of State securities more than they would tax the income of industrial bonds; and if they do that, what happens? You drive all of the money into the industrial bonds of the country, and you take away from the States and the subdivisions of the States and the Federal Government itself an advantage which they ought to retain, because the Federal and the State Governments protect all of the people of the country. Suppose we had war, would you want the States and the Federal Government to be at a disadvantage as compared with the securities of the great industrial of the country? Oh, you say that they will not do that. Why, they will do anything. Any outfit that will come in here and ask for a ship subsidy, any outfit that will come in here and demand such a piece of legislation as the Fordney-McCumber tariff law, the repeal of the excess-profits tax, and the lowering of the high surtaxes, will demand anything; and I have come to the conclusion that I would not believe any man on oath who would come before the Committee on Ways and Means and try to get the advantage of all of the rest of the people of the country, which they are always doing. They ought to be compelled to go under oath, and they ought to be compelled, if possible, to tell the truth when they are wanting this Congress to do something to their interests; and when they come here and say that this is in the interest of the masses of the people, they are saying what I think they know not to be the facts.

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLDFIELD. Yes.

Mr. LAZARO. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] was asked this question awhile ago, whether there was anything to prevent the States from taxing securities, and the answer was no. I would like to know if there is anything right now to prevent the Secretary of the Treasury from issuing tax-bearing bonds in exchange to those that fall due now?

Mr. OLDFIELD. No, I do not think so, and I think he ought to do it. Just to show you how inconsistent these gentlemen are, and I mean the Republican members of the Committee on Ways and Means, in 1921 when they were amending the revenue act, any man who had the money to go and buy them could purchase Federal bonds to the amount of $160,000 and they would all be tax exempt, and yet they came right along in the face of that and increased that from $160,000 to $165,000. I think every man in this House ought to vote against this resolution, and I am satisfied that half of you will.

Mr. LINTHICUM. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] spoke about the millions of dollars in these tax-exempt securities being in the hands of the rich. Has the gentleman any estimate of how much it would enhance the value of those bonds in the hands of the rich if we should pass this resolution prohibiting any further tax-exempt bonds?

Mr. OLDFIELD. Yes. If a great many of them are in the hands of the rich of the country it would instantly increase their value to have this resolution passed. If there are $11,000,000,000 of the bonds out, untaxed, the very moment that this resolution is adopted and ratified by the States it will increase the value of those bonds anywhere from $1,000,000,000 to $2,000,000,000. There can be no question about that.

Mr. ROSENBLOOM. In case this resolution were adopted and municipalities wish to borrow money, would they not be compelled to go to New York and borrow the money at whatever rate of interest New York might want to fix?

Mr. OLDFIELD. Well, yes, I think so. At any rate they would be put to very great disadvantage. It is difficult enough now, as you know, for the States to compete even with the Federal Government, as everybody would rather have Federal bonds because all of the States are behind them. If you pass this resolution and it is ratified you will make it almost impossible to build roads, to dig ditches, to reclaim overflowed lands, to irrigate dry lands out in the West, because you will have no place to sell the bonds. The great industrialists, the Steel Trust, the Standard Oil Co., the railroads, the public utilities of Washington and other cities, will have a monopoly of the bond market, and I think it is just as important that the various States and subdivisions thereof should be shown as much consideration in the bond market as the Federal Government or these great industrialists, and I hope that gentlemen will vote against it. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. How does the time stand?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa has 42 minutes and the gentleman from Texas 43 minutes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY].

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, the argument of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. OLDFIELD] seems to be based on a comparison between Government securities and those of industrial concerns. I can not see the line of comparison between the two types of securities. The man who takes a chance in an industrial bargain naturally looks for a higher return of revenue than if he buys gilt-edge municipal or State securities. You can not draw a comparison between those rates of interest. Further than that, he says that the moment we adopt this resolution we then put a premium on the present tax-exempt bonds. How can we avoid doing it, even admitting it will be done? The estimate of tax-exempt securities ranges from ten to eighteen billions. Why increase that enormous amount and make a still further loophole for the high-income man to escape taxation? That seems to be what the gentleman wants to do.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I can not, I regret; I have only five minutes. That is exactly the argument of the gentleman from Arkansas. Now, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this whole question ought to be considered on an entirely impartial and on an unselfish basis. We are here as the representatives of the people, interested in both the State and the Federal Government, and we ought to base our decision on the exact merits of the case rather than from any selfish viewpoint, whether we come from a particular district desiring to sell irrigation or roads or schoolhouse bonds, and when we do that, Mr. Chairman, and when we take into full consideration the merits of this case and study the testimony submitted pro and con, there can be but one decision reached. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], when the subject was under debate before, brought this very clearly before the House. He analyzed in his very careful and judicial manner the testimony that had been submitted to the Ways and Means Committee, and there could be no question the decision is impartial from the evidence submitted. We had great scholars before us; we had the authorities in the Treasury Department; we had men that had previous experience in the Treasury Department; and the one whom I looked to more during the period of the war for advice and suggestions than any other one man was Assistant Secretary Leffingwell, and if you gentlemen, Members of the House, not having studied this problem, will read his testimony in an impartial and fair light, I am sure you will realize the merits of this tax-exemption amendment we are considering here to-day. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] has also stated the case very effectively when he says that unless we adopt this amendment in a very short time the whole system of graduated income tax will fall. It can not help but fall when those having the highest incomes are able to place those incomes in tax-exempt securities in such enormous quantities as the Treasury officials to-day estimate they are doing. Briefly, the situation is this: People of large incomes can purchase securities aggregating eighteen billions and pay no taxes, whereas the average business man and the persons of small means must meet the entire tax levy. The rich man escapes; the business man, earning a livelihood, pays. There can be no question of comparison, Mr. Chairman, between the two classes of investments, and therefore it seems to me that an impartial judge must decide in favor of voting for this amendment. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] speaks of testimony pro and con taken by the Ways and Means Committee. The testimony, so to speak, was only pro. There is hardly any testimony, if any at all, upon the other side. Now, I think from a practical point of view that the best reasons given against this resolution are contained in the questions which were asked and in the statements made by the very able chairman of the Ways and Means Committee during the progress of the hearings. They are almost convincing, it seems to me, to any disinterested mind that the resolution ought to be rejected. I wish to quote another distinguished Republican on the principle that is involved. It is our duty to consider this matter from the viewpoint of the States, from the viewpoint of the Federal Government, and from the viewpoint of both as a dual system of government. When the sixteenth amendment was under consideration Hon. Charles E. Hughes was Governor of New York. He was of the opinion that the amendment, as framed, would enable the Federal Government to impose an income tax upon State securities and the securities of the political subdivisions of the States. It turned out that the Supreme Court held differently, but nevertheless the argument that was made at that time by Governor Hughes still stands in all its force and strength.

It is embodied in a message that he sent to the New York Legislature on January 5, 1910, from which I wish to read two or three extracts. He says:

But the power to tax incomes should not be granted in such terms as to subject to Federal taxation the incomes derived from bonds issued by the State itself, or those issued by municipal governments organized under the State's authority. To place the borrowing capacity of the State and of its governmental agencies at the mercy of the Federal taxing power would be an impairment of the essential rights of the State which, as its officers, we are bound to defend.

Governor Hughes is no fantastic advocate of any ancient or vague theory of State rights, but a statesman who takes a comprehensive view of the entire situation. He says further at another point:

To permit such securities to be the subject of Federal taxation is to place such limitations upon the borrowing power of the State as to make the performance of local government a matter of Federal grace.

And he says in conclusion:

While we may desire that the Federal Government may be equipped with all necessary national powers in order that it may perform its national function, we must be equally solicitous to secure the essential bases of State government.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I am sorry I have not the time to yield.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The present amendment does not go anything like as far as that amendment.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. It goes exactly as far as Governor Hughes supposed the sixteenth amendment would go.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I understand that the gentleman is quoting Governor Hughes to show that Congress now has the power to tax State securities, because that was the pending amendment at the time.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Governor Hughes thought that under the sixteenth amendment it would have the power, and he argued against the power being granted; and now you are seeking to accord the same power, and Governor Hughes's opposition stands against this proposed amendment as well as against the sixteenth amendment in the light of the construction he put upon it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. But, as I recall, Governor Hughes's opposition to that provision in the New York constitution was based on the proposition that under the sixteenth amendment Congress has the power to tax State securities.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. The gentleman misapprehends the point altogether. I am quoting from Governor Hughes's message to show that fundamentally he is opposed to this disturbance of the balance of powers; on the one hand the powers enjoyed by the States, and on the other hand the powers enjoyed by the Federal Government; and his argument is not diminished or weakened by the fact that you have the so-called reciprocity provision in the pending amendment.

In his message Governor Hughes quoted from the opinions in several cases decided by the Supreme Court. In one case the court said (p. 74):

It is admitted that there is no express provision in the Constitution that prohibits the General Government from taxing the means and instrumentalities of the States, nor is there any prohibiting the States from taxing the means and instrumentalities of that Government. In both cases the exemption rests upon necessary implication, and is upheld by the great law of self-preservation; as any government, whose means employed in conducting its operations, if subject to the control of another and distinct government, can exist only at the mercy of that government. Of what avail are those means if another power may tax them at discretion?

In another case the court said (p. 75):

The right of the States to administer their own affairs through their legislative, executive, and judicial departments, in their own manner through their own agencies, is conceded by the uniform decisions of this court, and by the practice of the Federal Government from its organization. This carries with it an exemption of those agencies and instrumentalities from the taxing power of the Federal Government. If they may be taxed lightly, they may be taxed heavily; if justly, oppressively. Their operation may be impeded and may be destroyed if an interference is permitted. Hence the beginning of such taxation is not allowed on the one side, is not claimed on the other.

[Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. May I have two minutes more?

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman two additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia is recognized for two minutes more.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I want to say this: It is almost absurd, I think, with due respect to the House and those in control, after a very casual hearing before the Committee on Ways and Means and only one side presented, to confine this House to a very brief period for the discussion of a very great question like this. The amendment, in my opinion, is full of defects. It will be an opening door for litigation such as some of the gentlemen on the other side do not now apprehend, and when we come to its discussion under the five-minute rule I shall endeavor to point out how uncertain, and for that reason how dangerous, even should it be assumed that the general proposition is a good one. [Applause.]

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman yields back the remainder of his time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back two minutes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for five minutes.

TAX EXEMPTION OF INCOME DERIVED FROM UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT BONDS AND BONDS OF THE STATES AND MUNICIPALITIES.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I have given a considerable amount of study to this proposed constitutional amendment and to the arguments which have been used against its adoption. I have given more study to the arguments against it than I have to the arguments for it, because, if I know my own thoughts and purposes, I would not do anything which would even remotely endanger the sovereignty of the States or threaten the perpetuity of the State governments. But I can not bring myself to share the fears and apprehensions which have been so eloquently and ably expressed by gentlemen who have spoken against the submission of the amendment.

Under the law and the Constitution as it exists at present, what is the condition in which we find ourselves? Here it is,

The Federal Government levies a graduated income tax and comes, we will say, to four of its citizens—Jones and Smith and Dubb and Dough, and each one of them is earning a $25,000 income annually—and Uncle Sam, through his tax collector, says to Jones and Smith and Dubb, "Come in here; I want to have a little word to say to you. I need some of your income. I want it to help support the Army and the Navy. I want it to help pay the expenses of the national defense. I need it to pay compensation to the wounded and disabled of the World War and their dependents. I need it to pay interest on the national debt and to provide a sinking fund for its ultimate retirement." Now, Jones earns his $25,000 as a manufacturer, and Smith earns his $25,000 as a live-stock producer and a farmer, and Dubb earns his $25,000 as a professional man, and Dough is a retired capitalist and his money is invested in State and municipal bonds, and it yields him an income of $25,000. But Uncle Sam says, "Dough, you can stay on the outside. I can't take any of your money because it is income from State bonds, and the courts have said I have not the power."

And then here is a State, Texas, we will say, and it levies an income tax for the support of its State government, and comes to four of its citizens, Jones, Smith, Dubb, and Dough. Jones is a manufacturer, Smith is a farmer and live-stock producer, Dubb is a professional man, and Dough is a retired capitalist and has his money invested in bonds of the United States Government. Each of them has an income of $25,000. The State of Texas, through its tax collector, comes to Jones and Smith and Dubb and says, "Come in here, I want to have a word to say to you. I need some of your income to carry on our public schools. I need some of your income to build public roads. I need some of your income to provide the State's eleemosynary institutions. I need some of your income to build asylums for the insane and hospitals for the blind."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield to me two or three minutes more?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. BLACK. Smith and Jones and Dubb say, "All right; we are willing to do our part; but why don't you call Dough also? He is just as much interested in the maintenance of schools and asylums and hospitals and good roads as we are, and has just as much income."

"Yes," says Texas, "I know what you say is true; but if I should call him in, he won't come, because the Supreme Court of the United States has said he need not come. That court has repeatedly ruled that under present constitutional limitations I have no power to require him to pay any part of his $25,000 income earned from United States Government bonds to the support of the State government under which he lives and whose benefits he enjoys."

Now, gentlemen, that is the situation in which we find ourselves at present. What do we propose to do by this amendment, if it is adopted? This is what we propose to do: When the amendment becomes a part of the Constitution the Federal Government will enact a graduated income tax law, and it will come to these same four citizens, Jones and Smith and Dubb and Dough, and say to them, "Come in here, Jones and Smith and Dubb; and you also come in this time, Dough. We now afford you the happy privilege of contributing to your Government's support on the same basis as Jones and Smith and Dubb, a pleasure which you have been hitherto denied." [Applause.] And in goes Dough with the rest to do business with the tax collector, not to be held up and robbed, but simply to pay the same amount as is paid by his neighbors and fellow citizens, Jones and Smith and Dubb.

Is there anything wrong about that? The only reason that I have heard as to why it should not be done is because the opponents of this amendment say to bring Dough in and tax his income will be to destroy the sovereignty of the States and undermine our dual system of government.

Well, I will simply say, I can not see it that way. If our dual system of government is no better founded than to be overturned by an act of justice of the kind I have just mentioned, then it rests upon much more flimsy foundation than I have always been led to believe. Such objections are of the wave and not the rock. Our Republic will only cease to be an indestructible union of indestructible States when in the bosoms of its citizens the spirit of liberty is dead and when their virtue shall become a jest and love of country a forgotten sentiment. Then is when America shall die and not before then. [Applause.]

Mr. ROSENBLUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. I regret that my time is so limited. I can not yield.

Mr. GARNER. I will yield to the gentleman one minute to answer my question.

Mr. BLACK. I yield with pleasure to my colleague from Texas.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman from Texas then would give the State of Texas or the Federal Government the power to say to Mr. Dough, "You shall pay ten times as much as Mr. Smith."

Mr. BLACK. No. I would not give that power.

Mr. GARNER. Yes; you do give the State of Texas and the Federal Government that power. You say they will not exercise it, but you are giving them the power.

Mr. BLACK. I will answer my colleague's question very frankly. I am not saying that I would not favor any amendment to the resolution.

Mr. GARNER. That is all right.

Mr. BLACK. But I do say that I do not share the fears and the apprehensions of my colleagues who have so ably argued against the submission of this amendment, and if there is an amendment offered which I think will better safeguard the resolution, I will be very glad to support it.

Mr. GARNER. But the gentleman would give that power to the Federal Government to discriminate.

Mr. BLACK. I do not agree that the amendment would be open to that construction. That is a point on which I disagree with my colleague from Texas, but at the same time I am perfectly willing to safeguard the power granted by any proper amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. GARNER. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HUSTED.]

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] referred to the testimony of Professor Seligman before the Ways and Means Committee in advocacy of this amendment. Professor Seligman is a very eminent economist. He has been on the staff of Columbia University in the city of New York for many years. He is a man of great reputation; but Professor Seligman is not infallible. I remember that many years ago Professor Seligman was the first man in the United States, so far as I know, to advocate the initiative, the referendum, and the recall. He advocated those political processes to his pupils in the classroom at Columbia University.

Professor Seligman got his ideas from the Swiss Cantons, but he was not practical enough to realize that while those political processes might be well adapted to the form of government in the Swiss Cantons they were not well adapted to our form of government. I also remember that more recently Professor Seligman has been very loud in his protest against a sales tax. I also assume that, like all other college professors who are political economists, he is absolutely opposed to a protective tariff in any form. [Laughter.]

I am opposed to this amendment, first, because I do not believe in tinkering with the Constitution of the United States, unless it is absolutely necessary. I think we are too quick to resort to constitutional amendment, when other remedies would serve the purpose. When we have any serious difficulties with our political system somebody gets up and advocates an amendment to the Constitution. Well, I have so much respect for that venerable document that I do not want to see the Constitution amended unless it is absolutely necessary, and I do not believe it is necessary in this case.

We are suffering from a very real evil. There is no question about that. A great deal of income is being invested in securities which are exempt from taxation. But they are not exempt from taxation because the Constitution says they are. They are exempt from taxation because the Federal Government and the State governments have seen fit to make them so. This amendment is paraded under a misnomer. This is not an amendment to make municipal securities and Federal securities taxable. It is a very different thing. It is an amendment proposed to the Constitution to make Federal securities taxable by State authorities and State securities taxable by Federal authority.

But as I have said, we are suffering from a real evil and it is an evil which has arisen since the war. Why did it not arise during the war? Because in war time men are patriotic and give up their income, no matter how highly it may be taxed, for the support of the Government. But when peace comes, if surtaxes are unreasonably high, so as to be unwise and foolish, so high as to be uneconomic, then a certain portion of income goes into tax-exempt securities. The remedy for this situation is not by amending the Constitution of the United States and taking off all brakes on taxation. The remedy is to reduce the high surtaxes to a reasonable amount. If those surtaxes are reduced to a reasonable amount, the money will not flow into tax-exempt securities but it will flow into business. It will flow into enterprise. Your present system of surtaxes is throttling industry, is throttling initiative. It is all right in time of war, because then it is essential, but it is all wrong and all unwise and all foolish in time of peace.

But what do you propose to do? You propose to take off all the brakes, and if you take off these brakes do you suppose this situation will ever be corrected? Do you suppose it will ever then be possible to get the high taxes reduced to a reasonable amount? Never in the world, and everybody knows it. So far (under the amendment) from getting the unreasonably high surtaxes reduced, the probability is that they will be increased to higher ranges until they amount almost to confiscation of all income.

But there is another reason why I am opposed to this amendment, and a more serious reason than any I have advanced. I believe it is utterly inconsistent with our conception of a dual form of government. [Applause.] The income tax law worked great changes in our form of government. Before we adopted the income tax law our revenue was comparatively small, but since its adoption it is practically unlimited. We can raise as much money as we want for any use to which we see fit to put it. The result has been that under the income tax law with the new-found theory of cooperation and with the utilization of the welfare clause of the Constitution, the Federal Government is constantly invading the domain of the States. The tendency is growing, and I regard it as a dangerous tendency. I do not want to see our Government become more paternalistic than it is. And so now under this proposed amendment you seek to remove the last barrier of the State against invasion by Federal authority. [Applause.] It is not necessary to do it, it is not wise to do it, and I do not believe it is patriotic to do it. [Applause.] Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back one minute.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks, and to incorporate therein some extracts from the decisions of the Supreme Court.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, how does the time stand?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] has 30 minutes remaining and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] has 27 minutes remaining.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON].

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, one of the most serious dangers that confronts the country to-day is the creation of special privileges and the enactment of legislation which creates discrimination between different classes of the population. That which is a crime for one is an innocent transaction for another. We have the formation of blocs in this country; I do not know what is the cause of the bloc, whether it is the discriminatory legislation or whether the blocs cause the discriminatory legislation. They act and react on each other. The fact that we have enacted these statutes which create discrimination makes it possible to bring into the body politic this dangerous feature of blocs.

Nothing should be more equal than taxation. Let me point out to you some of the evils of the present system. We have the high surtaxes. Surtaxes are proper and natural. They are necessary in order that the burden of taxation may be equal and that the burden may rest upon those most able to pay. Along with the creation of the surtaxes you provide an avenue of escape for the very rich men who desire to invest in tax-free securities. More than that, you create a leisure class, you create a class which loses interest in the industrial progress of the country and is satisfied to rest upon the income derived from securities which pay no taxes to the country. [Applause.] You fetter industry, you take the resources which should be invested in those developments which create employment and stimulate the growth and production of the country, and put them into tax-free securities.

I differ with the utmost diffidence from my good friend, Secretary Hughes, in his expressions in 1916. The evil had not then assumed the proportions which it now assumes. The amount issued in the year, 1921—I have not the returns for 1922—was about $1,300,000,000. The quantity has increased by leaps and bounds, and it will not be long before the total issues reach $2,000,000,000 per annum, and the aggregate between $20,000,000,000 and $30,000,000,000.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. There is this difference between this amendment and the one Secretary Hughes was speaking of. That gave the Federal Government absolute power to tax State securities entirely out of existence.

Mr. BURTON. Yes; it is a different situation and the proposition is a different one. Now, I am not at all afraid that this amendment will hamper the States or municipalities in borrowing all they need. I do think one beneficial thing would be wrought by it in that it would put some restraint on the wild riot in the issue of securities. We have had much extravagance in municipalities and too much extravagance right here in Congress.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURTON. I beg the gentleman's pardon, but I have only a minute more. But there is no danger that the municipalities and the States can not borrow all that they ought to have. They are a prime security. They are regarded as having a degree of stability and certainty which does not belong to most other investments. There is not the same risk that there is in industrial enterprise, and the rates of interest on the bonds of municipalities and States will range below those on industrial securities, very naturally. Let us have the same taxation for all securities. One of the three platforms of the French Revolution, along with liberty and fraternity, was equality, and there is nothing in which equality is more desirable than in the burden of taxation and in treating all alike. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN.]

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, John Marshall, the Chief Justice, in an opinion, once said that the power to tax is the power to destroy. In granting this power, which may be that of either life or death over the credit of the Nation and over the credit of the States, we should proceed with caution. I do not intend to discuss this proposed amendment to the Constitution from the viewpoint of its effect upon the sovereignty of the States. That issue has been fully presented in the course of this debate and may be disposed of by stating the undisputed fact that sovereignty without credit is no sovereignty at all.

But let us look at this amendment solely from the aspect of its effect upon the finances of the Federal Government, the States, and the political subdivisions of the States. As to the national finances I am sure that we are all convinced that the adoption of this amendment is in the interest of the Federal Government. The gentleman from New York [Mr. MILLS] has demonstrated that at the present time, while the United States gains about $111,000,000 annually in reduced rates of interest because of the fact that certain Federal securities are not taxed the Treasury is losing $250,000,000 each year by the inability to collect taxes on the income from these same securities. From a purely Federal point of view it therefore may be reasonably conceded that such a change in the Constitution is financially desirable.

DEBTOR STATES WILL NOT RATIFY.

There are certain older States of the Union, where conditions are more or less stabilized, which will also benefit by the taxation of the income from all securities. These States will not be under the necessity of borrowing so much money in the future because their road systems are practically completed, new school houses are not so urgently required, and they have but little land to be drained and none in need of irrigation. The natural resources of these States are, to a large extent, developed. Within these older States are many persons who have for a long time worked and saved and now have surplus capital to invest in securities issued by or under the authority of other States. Since each State is to be authorized to collect taxes on the income from securities owned by its residents these States will no doubt be glad to obtain additional revenues, the original source of which is outside of their borders. As there are creditor nations in the world, so are there creditor States in the Union and this constitutional amendment is primarily in their interest.

The United States, until a very few years ago, was a debtor nation. Throughout its history that fact was very properly taken into account by statesmen in determining our relations with other countries. McKinley repeatedly gave it as a reason for the adoption of a protective tariff. Therefore the people of the West and South, those vast regions whose adequate development requires the borrowing of large sums of money, have a right to consider their own welfare at a time when it is proposed to make a profound change in the financial and economic relationship which one State shall bear to another and to the Nation as a whole. There are more than 12 of the 48 States of the Union that are now, and for years will continue to be, borrowers rather than lenders. Their legislatures will not voluntarily surrender the privilege of obtaining loans for public purposes of every nature at as low a rate of interest as is possible, and consequently they will not be in any haste to ratify this amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. With pleasure.

Mr. MONDELL. Why did not the gentleman think of that when he supported the sixteenth amendment, the income-tax amendment, authorizing the Federal Government to levy upon the income of all of the States and the subdivisions of the States?

Mr. HAYDEN. That case is not at all analogous.

ROAD BONDS.

There are a number of States which have not taken complete advantage of the appropriations made by Congress to promote the construction of good roads. There is now to their credit several millions of dollars in the Federal-aid road fund which their legislatures have declined to match by an equal appropriation, presumably because more improved roads are not greatly needed. The State of Arizona, like practically all of the States of the West and South, has utilized every dollar of Federal aid and would like to see Congress appropriate more money for highway construction. To meet the allotments of Federal funds it has been necessary to issue road bonds in many instances. These securities have been sold to the residents of other States, and the State of Arizona would gain no revenue by making the income from them taxable.

SCHOOL BONDS.

The people of Arizona take just pride in the fact that their public-school system ranks third among all the 48 States of the Union. They have taxed themselves to the limit to maintain this proud position, and they will of necessity be forced to borrow money to keep pace with the demands for buildings to care for an ever-increasing school population. Of course they will want to secure the needed funds as cheaply as they can.

These securities must likewise be disposed of to residents of other States who desire safe investments. Arizona can not tax the owners of these school bonds because they do not live within the State and therefore can not be compelled to share in the cost of the local government. If one were to strike a balance, as did the gentleman from New York [Mr. MILLS], in the case of the Federal Government, it is certain that the taxpayers of my State have more to lose than to gain by the adoption of this proposed change in the Constitution.

MUNICIPAL IMPROVEMENT BONDS.

Those of us who have fought what we thought was a good fight in favor of the municipal ownership of water works and other public utilities are blandly told that we have gone entirely too far. The report on this resolution says that the power of a city or town to issue tax-free securities amounts to a subsidy offered to every such corporation. It also operates as an inducement to every municipality to have all kinds of public utilities owned and controlled by the municipality itself. It is obvious that this condition of affairs makes it difficult for public utilities privately conducted to maintain their financial condition.

Granting that all that I have quoted is true, yet I fail to see anything in the argument that would induce a member of a State legislature, who believes in municipal ownership, to vote for the ratification of an amendment to the Federal Constitution which will make taxable the bonds issued by his city or town for a water system or other public improvements.

IRRIGATION AND DRAINAGE BONDS.

There are millions of acres of land in the West and South awaiting reclamation, either by irrigation or drainage. Experience has demonstrated that the most successful way to bring these waste places under cultivation is through the organization of irrigation or drainage districts. In either event the district is a municipal corporation organized under the authority of the State with power to issue bonds. The reclamation law now requires the organization of such districts on all new projects. The Smith-McNary bill, which has been favorably reported to both the Senate and the House, specifically provides that whenever the lands within an irrigation or drainage project are appraised by the Federal Farm Loan Board and found to be worth more than twice the cost of their reclamation then the bonds of the district shall be sold and the United States reimbursed for the entire cost of the project. It is not denied that these district bonds, which may now be issued tax free, will have to bear a higher rate of interest if that privilege is withdrawn. The adoption of this constitutional amendment will therefore result in the imposition of an additional burden upon the settlers on all future reclamation projects.

FEDERAL FARM LOAN BONDS.

I have a further objection to this amendment which is most serious. I am convinced that, so far as securities of the United States are concerned, it is aimed directly at the taxation of Federal farm-loan bonds. It is true that the National Grange and the American Farm Bureau Federation, both representative of farmer's opinion throughout the United States, have gone on record in favor of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit further issues of tax-free securities, but I seriously doubt whether the membership in general of either of those great organizations have studied this question in all of its phases. Last January the President called a national agricultural conference in the city of Washington, which was composed of about 350 delegates from all sections of the United States. At that conference the following resolution was adopted:

We recommend: * * * A constitutional amendment prohibiting issuance of tax-free securities: Provided, That inasmuch as agricultural lands and mortgages are both taxed, and that agriculture is a fundamental industry upon which all industries depend, nothing in these resolutions shall apply to bonds, debentures, certificates of indebtedness issued under authority of the Federal farm loan act on any amendment thereto.

The war with Germany is over and the amount of our national debt will gradually decrease. This amendment is not retroactive and the outstanding obligations of the United States can not be taxed. The only new Federal securities likely to be issued in any large amount in the future are the farm-loan bonds. If it is not the purpose to tax these bonds, then the adoption of this amendment would be a nullity, because under its terms there can be no discrimination in favor of any class of securities. The income from all bond issues authorized by the Federal Government must be taxed at the same rate as the income from State securities of every character. The time may come when it will be proper to tax Federal farm-loan bonds, but I am unwilling to do anything at present which will interfere with the widest possible extension of the benefits of the farm loan act that may be consistent with sound business principles.

FEDERAL FARM LOAN SYSTEM SHOULD BE ALLOWED TO EXPAND.

We are told in the report on this resolution that only 5 per cent of the American farmers who have borrowed money have obtained it from the Federal land banks. That may be true, but there are good reasons for the comparatively small amount which has been loaned. The United States entered the World War shortly after the farm loan act was passed and the bond market was taken up by vast issues of Government securities. Then there was the long delay before the Supreme Court determined whether the act was constitutional. The Federal farm-loan system is yet young. It is just beginning to properly function. Do not cripple it now by taxation, but let it expand and render the service for which it was intended. When the Federal farm-loan banks have supplied the long-time credit needs of 25 or 50 per cent of our farmers, we may then stop to consider whether such bonds shall be taxed.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. Certainly.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman is making a very fair argument and I want to compliment him on it, but the gentleman surely is aware that Congress can tax these farm-loan bonds now?

Mr. HAYDEN. But the States can not.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. That is true.

Mr. HAYDEN. The United States can not tax a State security unless it also taxes the Federal farm-loan bonds.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Very true.

Mr. HAYDEN. Then this constitutional amendment is designed to tax Federal farm-loan bonds?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I do not know how the farmers of other States are, but I know the farmers in my State say if they have an even chance, if they are not obliged to compete with tax-exempt securities, they are willing those securities shall be taxed.

Mr. HAYDEN. But the farmers have not been getting an even chance. The only way that they have obtained any kind of equality is through the Federal farm-loan system which this amendment to the Constitution seeks to destroy.

Mr. STEAGALL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield to my friend from Alabama.

Mr. STEAGALL. A number of distinguished persons have recently been before one of the committees advocating an increase in the maximum amount of loans by the farm-loan banks, and opposing tax-free securities. They have no difficulty in reconciling the two positions.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. They have got all the money they need.

CENSUS BUREAU NOW GATHERING STATISTICS ON INDEBTEDNESS.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I can see no need for haste in the submission of this proposed amendment to the State legislatures. No one to-day can tell the value of the outstanding tax-free securities. Practically all of the figures submitted in support of this resolution are based upon data gathered by the Census Bureau in 1912. That bureau is now engaged in an investigation which will show the total indebtedness of the Nation, the 48 States, the counties, and all other civil divisions. Within a year these new facts will be available. Congress and the State legislatures can then act intelligently, so why not wait until the effect of such an amendment can be properly estimated.

TAXES ALWAYS PASSED ON TO BORROWER.

I fully appreciate the desire of the great majority of our citizens that the owners of no form of wealth shall escape taxation. It was this same desire that induced many States to impose a tax on mortgages. The result was a positive injury to the borrowers, because since no one is compelled to make a loan the interest rate was raised to offset the tax. The owner of a mortgage does not pay the tax, and neither will the owner of any taxable security issued by the United States or by authority of any State. The tax will be passed on to the borrower, either through the purchase of the security below par or by increasing the rate of interest. In other words, those who have money to loan will always find a way to obtain a net return for its use which equals the current rate of interest, and no law ever passed has effectively changed this fundamental economic fact.

INCOME FROM EXISTING TAX-FREE SECURITIES EXEMPT.

In conclusion let me say that no one pretends that this amendment will result in the taxation of incomes derived from the more than ten billions of State, county, and municipal securities that are now tax exempt. Yet these are the very incomes that everyone says should be taxed. That is the universal desire, whether it be voiced by a demagogue who hates the rich because they are rich or by a patriotic rich man who honestly and sincerely desires that every form and kind of wealth shall bear its just share of the burdens of taxation. No one denies that if all future issues of securities are taxed then the value of the existing tax-free issues will immediately increase because there will be no more like them. If this increase is only 10 per cent, over a billion dollars of unearned wealth will accrue to those who now hold these tax-exempt securities.

Would it not be well to pause before we take this step? We are asked to amend the Constitution, which not only guarantees to each of us our civil liberties but protects us all in our rights to property. It is the supreme law of the land. Certainly in time a way can be found to perfect this or any other amendment so that at least a thousand million dollars will not be handed over to a few men who have not earned it and who have no moral right to its acquirement. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, contrary to the advice of my physician, I got out of bed to-day to come over here that I might hear the arguments against this resolution, with the hope that I might hear something said or some argument advanced which would enable me to vote with the seeming majority upon my side of the aisle. I regret to say that thus far I have not heard one single argument that in the least changes my opinion relative to this subject. Taxation always has been and always will be the greatest question before the American people. We have had from the foundation of this Republic until now what we call tax experts. The more I have seen of them the quicker I am prepared to run from them, just as I would from the smallpox. [Laughter.] There is no tax expert who is pushing himself forward in our Nation's affairs to-day who is not a paid expert of the rich, unless it be the rich himself who does the talking. The argument has been advanced here to-day that if we impose a tax upon securities which now go untaxed, that they will advance in value. That argument is contrary to every economic principle that I have ever heard advanced before, but I hope it is true. If a town or a city or a county or a State wishes to borrow money and the placing of a tax upon the proposed loan will advance the price of the securities, then Heaven knows I would be pleased, and I think everybody else ought to be. Then, again, we have just heard advanced by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HUSTED] that he is opposed to tinkering with the Constitution. I would like to ask the gentleman if there has ever been a single amendment made to the Constitution of the United States that he opposes, unless it be the sixteenth amendment, which authorizes the income tax? The per cent is all against the gentleman. He is for every one of them, unless it be the sixteenth, and to-day his argument or his speech against this resolution is but another evidence that he would like to have certain property escape taxation.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] just a moment ago advanced the correct theory about this subject; and that is that certain classes of property and certain classes of persons are constantly being made for purposes of discrimination being made in their favor. To me this is the easiest solved subject that has ever been presented to me since I have been in this legislative body. Down in Kentucky, my native State, we have the most infamous tax law that is on the statute books of any State in the whole Union. There money deposited in bank pays a tax of only 10 cents, but money invested in farms and other projects or undertakings that the public or the people must have bears a tax of 40 cents.

Capital seeks not only the largest return, but it also seeks the lowest tax rate. Neither the largest returns nor the lowest tax rate is to be found in investments in farming lands. I do not mean farm mortgages. I mean money invested in the actual purchase of farm lands. When we come to realize that cultivation of the farm is man's first necessity, we should, without hesitation, undertake to relieve that necessity of as much burden as possible.

However, the whole trend for many years has been to increase the burden on that greatest of necessities and to lessen it on other property until now, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] has just said, there are eighteen billions of securities upon which no tax is imposed, and a billion and a half are annually being added to that already enormous amount.

Only the other day I saw in one of the Louisville papers the statement that 10 banks alone in that city held on deposit more than one hundred millions of dollars.

I am not advised how much is on deposit with the hundreds of other banks in the State, but it is safe to say that the amount just mentioned is multiplied over and over again.

And all that money pays a tax of only 10 cents, as compared to 40 cents which farming lands bear. And, worse than that, the banks are now claiming that they should pay no tax at all.

Reference to the unholy tax law in Kentucky may seem to some to be foreign to the subject now under discussion, but it is not, for it tends to show the drift to saddle the bulk of taxation on man's very first necessity, instead of upon luxuries, has reached the point where an end to it must come.

Every dollar that is invited to securities upon which there is little or no tax is a dollar driven from the farm, where taxes are highest.

If the tax on cultivated land were made our smallest tax and that on idle lands and intangibles made the largest, then capital would go to cultivated lands. And when capital had gone into cultivated lands there would be better farming, better products, and more upon which human life must be sustained.

Banks throughout the country are paying 4 per cent and even 5 per cent on deposits. They can not live on the difference between what they pay for money and what the law allows them to charge. The system begets usury; usury carried into business compels higher prices; and higher prices add to the cost of living. So I advocate turning the stream of money from the small bank tax, from untaxed securities, and from lightly taxed securities to the cultivation of the fields and the working of the coal mines—of the one to give food and raiment to humankind, and the other to give warmth to the cold.

About the only redeeming feature of the Kentucky tax law is that it does not tax farm products for the year of their production. This gives the producer time to put his grain, and so forth, on the market, and by taxing it after the first year has some tendency at least to prevent the granaries from holding it back from consumption.

Coal, like wheat, should be taxed out of the ground. But when out neither should bear more tax than barely enough to hurry it along to the needy. Bread, blankets, clothing, and coal—the prime necessities of man—should go to man bearing the smallest possible tax; and this can not be so as long as other property, like the $18,000,000,000 just mentioned by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] goes scot free, to say nothing of the untold millions of intangible personal property which bear a minimum tax.

Never was there a greater fallacy than that a small tax on intangibles produces more revenue than a larger tax. The smaller tax does not increase the per cent of property listed for taxation. It does, however, increase the volume or total. But, while the small tax on intangibles increases the total amount of that class of property given in for taxable purposes, it at the same time lessens the volume or total amount of other property given in for assessment. When capital is withdrawn from investment in any class of property and put into another, the one is increased and the other decreased. If Kentucky's tax system were reversed—if producing lands bore the smaller rate and idle capital the larger rate—then the tide of capital from the farm to tax-free securities would change and flow toward the farm and the smaller rate. Wherever the smaller rate of taxation is found there you will also find an increasing volume or total of taxable returns, and with it a larger revenue. I wish I had sufficient time to go further into demonstrating this position, but I hope I have already made it clear.

Gentlemen who oppose this resolution seem to forget that they are not acting finally. All that the resolution proposes is to submit the proposition to the several States. I for one say let it go to the people for their acceptance or rejection.

One gentleman has said in substance that because those of the Republican Party who usually speak for the rich are in favor of the resolution that he is disposed to oppose it. That is not a safe test of the merits of the proposition. The public-spirited man who relies on the worth of his own good judgment is in much safer hands than when simply opposing those whose motives he prefers to suspect. The best fee I ever received and the biggest case I ever won in the courthouse was accomplished by not combating the position taken by opposing counsel. As long as he was coming my way I offered no resistance.

Uniform taxation and economical expenditures are Democratic doctrines. So let the Republicans come on our way; do not stop them. Their motives in supporting this resolution to abolish nontaxable property perhaps comes as a result of the dressing down they got at the recent election.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER].

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arizona?

There was no objection.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Chairman, it is not often that my good friend from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON], who has just spoken, draws erroneous conclusions from what others have said. His speech, however, shows that he wholly failed to catch the significance of the arguments advanced by some—that if the pending resolution should be submitted and finally ratified by the States it would serve to largely enhance the value of all tax-exempt securities issued prior to the amendment's adoption. No one undertook to say, as the gentleman seems to have understood, that the ratification of the amendment would increase the value of the securities thereafter issued, but on the other hand it has been contended that the interest rates on securities thereafter issued will be increased, and that there will be a large increase in the value of all tax-exempt securities now outstanding or hereafter issued prior to the ratification of the amendment. Attention was further called to the fact that it is claimed that a large part of the outstanding tax-exempt securities are now held by the rich.

If the Members of the House will take time to read the speeches favoring the resolution, which have been made to-day, as well as those made in December, when the resolution was first discussed, you will find that the only reason advanced by those favoring the submission of the pending constitutional amendment is simply that an opportunity and an encouragement to avoid the burdens of taxation is now afforded the very rich by investing their money in tax-exempt securities. I repeat, this is the one and only reason given in the speeches delivered on the floor of the House, so far as I can discover, for favoring this resolution. In other words, the advocates of the resolution point alone to an individual abuse of an unrestricted privilege now open to individuals, partnerships, corporations, and estates to buy and hold tax-exempt securities in unlimited amounts.

I recognize there may be some force in that argument, and that there may be some ground for the fear expressed by some that the abuse and evil, to which they call attention, will grow, unless some method can be found to check it. I will go even further and state that if the pending amendment is the sole and only remedy to correct the abuse and evil referred to, then there is reason for now giving serious consideration to the submission of the pending amendment. I submit, however, in all candor, that the pending resolution is not only not the sole and only remedy but it is not even the best remedy—yea, it is neither a sound nor reasonable remedy. It is not a remedy which the States will ever ratify, and if you submit the pending amendment as a remedy for the evil complained of the result will be a long postponement in the submission of a reasonable and effective remedy. This proposed amendment, when understood, will never be ratified by the requisite number of States, but its submission may cause the early issue of a large volume of bonds bearing tax-exempt privileges—so that such bonds can be sold in advance of any possible ratification of the amendment.

Its submission will lead to propaganda by the very rich, who desire to invest money in tax-exempt securities, seeking to encourage States, municipalities, and school districts to issue bonds at once, for the reason, forsooth, that unless issued and sold before the ratification of the submitted amendment, all tax-exempt privileges will be denied such bonds. Now, I submit there is an effective remedy for the evil complained of, and I now propound this question to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], who has spoken in favor of the pending resolution: Could not the evil and abuse you complain of be met by the submission of an amendment giving the right to levy a tax on tax-exempt securities hereafter issued, when held by any individual, estate, partnership, or corporation in excess of a reasonable limit [applause], thus making the income from all tax-exempt securities hereafter issued, when owned by an individual, estate, company, or corporation, in excess of an amount to be fixed, subject to the levy of a tax? [Applause.]

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. If those happen to be State and municipal securities, I would like to know how the gentleman would tax them under the decision of the Supreme Court?

Mr. OLIVER. The gentleman misunderstands my position. Of course, it will necessitate the submission of a constitutional amendment. My position is, if the abuses complained of are so great as to now suggest the submission of an amendment to the Constitution, then instead of submitting an amendment which will hereafter deny to the United States, and to all States, the sovereign right that they now enjoy, why not submit an amendment, involving simply the right to impose on securities, hereafter issued under the authority of any State, a tax, when such securities are owned by any individual, partnership, or corporation in excess of an amount which you may determine as a reasonable limit? Now, unfortunately, the reason given in the speeches that have been delivered, favoring the pending amendment, are not the only purposes, which some have in mind, who strongly favor the submission of this amendment. The gentleman from New York [Mr. MILLS] possibly represents the richest constituency of any man on the floor of the House. He strongly favors the pending resolution, and made what I consider a very damaging admission, before the committee, during its consideration of the resolution. We find, however, no reference to it in his speeches on the floor. This was his statement to the committee in reference to the pending resolution:

We have got to look at this from the national standpoint. We are giving to the States the privilege, to be sure, of taxing national securities, but in return we are getting the great mass of securities that on the whole are going to constitute a much larger tax base than the Federal securities are, and what is more, we are asking for the benefit and we are getting the benefit of taxing them at a much higher rate than the States are likely to do.

His answer may be that the resolution requires that the National Government levy a like tax upon any securities that it may hereafter issue. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] has well pointed out that for years to come, if this resolution should be ratified by the States, there may thereafter be no occasion for the issuance of national bonds and securities. The resolution, you will note, only deals with securities issued by the Federal Government or under the authority of any State after the ratification of the amendment by the States.

How many States are likely to ratify this amendment, if the gentleman from New York was correct in his statement before the committee as to the power it confers on Congress? I repeat again, the individual abuses urged by those who have spoken in favor of the pending amendment can be corrected without denying to the United States or any State an important sovereign right it now enjoys.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. HUSTED] well characterized the pending amendment as a "quack remedy." Every evil and abuse suggested by the gentleman from New York [Mr. MILLS] or by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], who, in December, spoke in favor of this resolution, can be effectively met by an amendment such as I have suggested. There is some ground for hoping that the States might grant to Congress the right to impose a tax on securities hereafter issued under the authority of the State, when such securities are held by an individual, estate, partnership, or corporation in excess of, say, $100,000, or some other amount which you may determine is reasonable. You would simply then give to the Federal Government power to levy a tax on the income from securities thereafter issued under authority of a State when such securities were held by any single interest in excess of a reasonable amount. A market for securities issued under authority of a State can always be found on advantageous terms, even though the income from tax-exempt bonds issued by such State may be subject to a reasonable tax when such securities are held by any single interest in excess of a reasonable amount. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. OLIVER. Under leave to extend my remarks, I simply wish to set out how section 1 will read if the amendment, which I will later offer, is adopted thereto:

SECTION 1. The United States shall have power to lay and collect taxes on income derived from securities issued, after the ratification of this article, by or under the authority of any State, when such securities are owned by any individual, estate, partnership, or corporation whose ownership of tax-exempt securities, Federal or State, exceed $100,000 in amount, according to the par face value of such securities, but without discrimination against income derived from such securities and in favor of income derived from securities issued, after the ratification of this article, by or under the authority of the United States or any other State.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its secretaries, announced that the Senate had agreed to the conference report on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, had further insisted upon its amendments numbered 7, 12, and 13 to the bill (H. R. 13593) making appropriations for the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had asked a further conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. STERLING, Mr. PHIPPS, Mr. McKELLAR, and Mr. HARRIS as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 247) authorizing the appropriation of funds for the maintenance of public order and the protection of life and property during the convention of the Imperial Council of the Mystic Shrine in the District of Columbia June 5, 6, and 7, 1923, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Senate Resolution 415.

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. THOMAS E. WATSON, late a Senator from the State of Georgia.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the business of the Senate be now suspended to enable his associates to pay tribute to his high character and distinguished public services.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 13696) making appropriations for the Executive Office and for sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I listened with a great deal of interest to the speech of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER], who has just taken his seat, because at the beginning of his remarks he said that, admitting a grievous condition of affairs and one that should be cured, the remedy proposed was not a proper one, and he would suggest a sufficient, proper, and wise remedy. And then he proceeded to suggest that the Federal Government should attempt to limit the amount of State and municipal securities that an individual might hold. Now, I am not a constitutional lawyer—

Mr. OLIVER. Will the gentleman yield a moment?

Mr. MONDELL. No; I can not yield. I am not a constitutional lawyer. I do not pretend to know as much about the Constitution as the gentleman from Alabama does; but unless I have an entirely erroneous idea of that instrument, in order to accomplish what the gentleman from Alabama seeks to accomplish it would be necessary not only to amend the Constitution but to rewrite it from stem to gudgeon and to entirely change its principles.

Mr. OLIVER. Unquestionably it would be necessary to amend it.

Mr. MONDELL. Why, surely; and that would be a lovely amendment.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER], following the practice frequently indulged in by people who have not a good case, talked about everything except the matter before us. Among other things, he charged me with inconsistency because I believe we should vote on this matter at this time. That was just a little smoke screen intended to cover the monumental and unfathomable inconsistency of the gentleman from Texas in the position he now takes.

The gentleman from Texas has been noted as one of those who claimed to be after the rich. He has insisted, or assumed to, that they should be taxed and taxed a plenty. And now that we are endeavoring to present to the people of the United States for their adoption a proposal under which the rich can not escape taxation, the gentleman offers as an excuse for his opposition the fallacious argument that we are invading State rights. Well, the gentleman should have thought of that when he favored so earnestly and vigorously the adoption of the sixteenth amendment to the Constitution, one of the greatest invasions of the rights of the citizen in the State ever accomplished since the foundation of the Government, if we may except the eighteenth amendment, for which both the gentleman and I voted.

Mr. GARNER. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I did not vote for the eighteenth amendment. [Laughter.]

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, no; I recall the gentleman did not. I accept the gentleman's apology. The gentleman did not vote for it. He did, however, favor the adoption of the sixteenth amendment, and in doing so we created a condition in this country in some respects as inconsistent and illogical as it is possible for the human mind to imagine. We are now proposing to give the people an opportunity to cure that situation.

The gentleman from Texas, in his alleged desire to tax the rich a plenty, insists on maintaining a 50 per cent surtax on top of an 8 per cent normal tax on large incomes. The gentleman says he wants to tax the rich. It is true that the 58 per cent normal and surtax is not reasonable, sensible, consistent, or wise in time of peace. It is true it does not secure so large a tax return from the rich as a lower tax would, but the gentleman from Texas insists upon it. He insists, so he says, that gentlemen who have great wealth shall pay large sums into the Federal Treasury—sometimes. Having insisted upon that he would have us leave open an avenue as wide as the horizon through which the rich may escape all income taxation. He would continue a condition under which eventually no productive industrial enterprise in America, unless it were earning a return that would be extraordinarily burdensome on the people, will be utilized by men of large wealth as a theater of activity and investment. Henry Ford with his great wealth can afford to build automobiles just so long as he can make upward of 15 or 18 per cent on the manufacture of automobiles. But the moment conditions arise under which the American people are not to be compelled to pay those great returns Mr. Ford, and all like him, will get out of industrial enterprises and invest their money in tax-free securities. The gentleman from Texas and those who share his view and who have assumed his attitude can not fool the people by any pretense that here is an invasion of State rights. We now have a situation under which the very rich are continually taking their funds out of industrial enterprises and investing them in tax-free securities. Within a week word has come to me of a transfer in New York of more than $40,000,000 from great industrial enterprises of very great importance to the Northwest, in which eventually hundreds of millions of dollars would have been invested—a transfer of more than $40,000,000 from that enterprise into tax-free securities. Ah, the gentleman from Texas—

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. No; I can not yield.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. On that particular point?

Mr. MONDELL. I can not yield. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER], adroit as he is, can not successfully ride these two horses, going in exactly opposite directions. Either he is in favor, as he claims, of compelling great wealth to make a large contribution to the Federal Treasury or he is not in favor of it, one or the other. [Applause.] He can not hold both beliefs and he can not carry out both intents and purposes at the same time. We shall either tax great wealth under this amendment when adopted or the holders of great wealth shall continue to enjoy the privilege of investing in classes of securities on which they pay no penny of tax into the Federal Treasury. Which shall it be? I do not favor a 50 per cent surtax. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] does. This amendment would be just as necessary if the surtax were reduced by half, for even then men could not afford to retain their investments in productive enterprises except when they paid great profits, so long as the field of tax-free securities remained open before them. I suggest to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] and those who hold the view he claims to hold that they leave the company of gentleman who do not believe in income taxes, who do not believe in surtaxes on large incomes, who are against even a moderate surtax, and get over on the side of the people who believe that wealth should pay a fair income tax and be deprived of the avenues of escape therefrom. [Applause.]

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, there will be only one more speech on this side.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] has seven minutes remaining.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I want to take the seven minutes remaining to me to use the illustration of my friend and colleague [Mr. BLACK], and I thank him for giving it to me. I want to propound to him this question: Take Mr. Jones, a merchant; Mr. Smith, a farmer; Mr. Dubb, a professional man; and Mr. Dough, a retired capitalist. Are you willing to say to the Congress we are going to give you power to say to Dough, because you invest in State and municipal securities which we think ought not to be used or issued in too great quantities—are you willing to say to the Federal Government, "We are going to give you the power to tax Dough ten times what you tax Smith"?

Mr. BLACK. I am not willing to do that.

Mr. GARNER. I say to the gentleman that if you adopt the Green amendment without any amendment to it you give the Government that power.

Mr. BLACK. I am willing to safeguard it so the taxation shall be on an absolutely equal basis.

Mr. GARNER. That is all right, but I want to ask the gentleman this question—the gentleman from Texas was making an argument in favor of the Green amendment, and I now ask him if he is willing to vote for it if it will do what I have said, and he says "No."

Mr. BLACK. I have not accepted the gentleman's interpretation of the Green amendment.

Mr. GARNER. I think I can convince any jury on the face of God's green earth that if you will give me the power granted in the amendment I can pass any law that I please, and I can pass a law providing that when any man holds State or municipal securities that his income therefrom shall be taxed ten times the income of an individual. I could do that under this amendment, can I not? I yield to the gentleman to answer.

Mr. BLACK. The income of an individual may include many classes of income. What does the gentleman mean?

Mr. GARNER. For illustration, the income of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] is $10,000 from the grocery business and the income of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER] is $10,000 from State bonds; I can pass a law requiring the gentleman from Texas to pay $100 and the gentleman from Alabama to pay $1,000 on that income.

Mr. BLACK. The Green amendment provides that the Federal Government in levying the tax does not have power to levy any greater tax on State or municipal bonds than it does on its own bonds. It is inconceivable—

Mr. GARNER. Oh, the gentleman is assuming what all men assume who support the amendment. He is assuming that Congress will not do a foolish thing. You can not afford to assume that Congress will not exercise the power that the State has surrendered. Why ask the State to surrender the power unless you are going to use it? I ask why you do not amend this so that you can not tax the income of all of the people more than you do an individual?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER. I will.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Is it not possible, as the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER] stated, that the Federal Government shall virtually cease to issue bonds hereafter for the purpose of absolutely stopping the issue of State bonds, and then levy very high or confiscatory taxes on State bonds or municipal bonds?

Mr. GARNER. Let me say that the record is full—the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], the gentleman from New York [Mr. MILLS], and every gentleman that has argued this question has come back to the original proposition that the States and municipalities are becoming too extravagant in the issue of bonds. That may be true, but are we to surrender the power of the State to issue them because they are temporarily displaying extravagance and unwisdom in issuing bonds?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER. I will yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Do I understand the gentleman to say that under his conception of this amendment it would be possible to tax the income from municipal bonds at ten times that of any other security?

Mr. GARNER. I did not say any other security; I said income of an individual.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does the gentleman claim the limit under the present law is 58 per cent?

Mr. GARNER. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does the gentleman say that Congress has the power to tax 58 per cent?

Mr. GARNER. It would. I want to ask the gentleman from Ohio if we adopt this amendment if he would vote to pass a law that would double the tax on incomes from municipal bonds over what the individual pays on his personal income?

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman from Texas said he could multiply it indefinitely. The gentleman will withdraw that?

Mr. GARNER. Yes; for the sake of the argument, I will withdraw it.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman was one-fifth correct.

Mr. GARNER. All right; let the gentleman from Ohio agree to my proposition that the amendment authorizes Congress to place a tax of twice as much on bonds of Cincinnati as he would on the income of the individual.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman modifies his statement.

Mr. GARNER. Does the gentleman agree to my premise?

Mr. LONGWORTH. No; I do not.

Mr. GARNER. Then the gentleman does not understand the amendment. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa has 16 minutes remaining.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, in the few minutes remaining to close general debate I have no time for introduction or preliminaries, but must come down to some of the main objections made to this resolution. It has been claimed that the real object and purpose of the resolution is to prevent absolutely the issuance of any further tax-exempt securities by States and municipalities. This argument is based on some statements made by the President and the Secretary of the Treasury in support of the resolution, when they called attention to the flood of tax-exempt securities that are now being poured out. It is an all-sufficient answer to this claim to state that example and experience show that such will not and can not be the case.

No other country in the world gives such an exemption. Canada does not, and the securities of Canada, taxable at home and taxable here, are sold freely upon our own markets at rates below some of the rates required on our own tax-exempt securities. England does not permit any such exemption, and the securities of the cities of England sell at a lower rate as a rule than those of this country. France does not, and even poverty-stricken, ruined France has no trouble in negotiating the bonds of her cities. The error in this respect is all the greater because the claim is made in behalf of the small municipality and of the district far away from money centers that this resolution ought not to be adopted because it would prevent those securities from being negotiated.

The fact is that they do not get any appreciable benefit out of the present situation. On January 17 I introduced a set of tables in the RECORD which showed that the bonds of small towns in the South, of irrigated districts in the far West, bore a rate of 6 per cent, and they were getting no benefit out of this situation, while the bonds of high-class railways, taxable so far as the income was concerned, were in some instances being negotiated at a rate lower than 5 per cent. What is the reason for this? The reason is that security is first, and not the rate. The large investor wants to have his money in well-known securities, readily marketable and upon which he can readily realize. The real beneficiary of this tax exemption is not the small town or the irrigated district. The real beneficiary is the man of great wealth who does not have his money invested in active business and great estates like that of Marshall Field, entailed upon a person who never has or ever will lift his hand or use his brain in productive enterprise. It is proposed now that we shall maintain in behalf of such people this bounty of the Government, while we shall lay the burdens of taxation upon the high-class artisan, upon the salaried man, upon the man in active business who supports not only himself but large communities by his energy and his enterprise.

I have often heard the charge upon this floor from gentlemen on the other side that those of large wealth who invested their money in tax-exempt securities are tax dodgers and tax evaders. I do not consider them such. If it is right as a principle and practice to issue tax-exempt securities, it is right to buy them.

The wrong against the Government is the wrong in permitting them to be issued. Who will be responsible for the continuance of this condition if this amendment is defeated? Upon whom will rest the blame for the failure of these men of great wealth to contribute in proportion to their incomes to the support of the Government? Upon those who vote against the resolution. No one can escape from the conclusion that those who advocate the continuance of this condition, those who vote against this amendment, in reality favor and advocate men of great wealth being able to exempt their property from taxation.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman has referred several times to men of great wealth and to estates investing money in these tax-free securities. Was there not information of a specific character before the committee that that has occurred? The fact has been doubted by some.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Testimony was offered before the committee to that effect. I know there are some, not many, some on each side of the aisle, who frankly admit that they believe that wealth is now overtaxed, and they wish to provide this avenue of escape, but all admit, on the other hand, that those who are opposed to the resolution are in favor of providing this avenue of escape to the extremely wealthy.

There are some who believe that they can find a defense for their vote against the resolution in the amendment which will be offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER], an amendment which I trust will be rejected. The gentleman from Texas has all along been against this resolution. The Secretary of the Treasury has told us that this amendment which the gentleman from Texas proposes would absolutely nullify the resolution which is before us; but the gentleman from Texas says that he wants to prevent discrimination against State securities which he claims could be made under this resolution, made by the Representatives of the State in Congress. If Congress was disposed to so act, let me call the attention of the gentleman from Texas to the fact that discrimination can be made now. We can discriminate now against these securities, and if this resolution is defeated we will be forced to do so. There are a half dozen ways in which we can discriminate against these State securities, but Congress has never wished to levy discriminating taxes. It never has wished to put any tax upon these securities in such a way as would absolutely put them out of existence, but the gentleman from Texas says that the power to tax may be abused. What power to tax was ever given any government that could not be abused? It is impossible to give the power to tax without giving something that may be abused. If you do so limit it, you nullify it.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Pardon me. I have not the time. If this fair and equitable method, this method that puts the States and the Federal Government upon perfect equality, be rejected, then we must use some other method, even though it be something that Congress in the first instance would not wish to put into effect and a tax that does not in all respects work justly.

Mr. Chairman, it has been said that there has been propaganda in favor of this resolution. It is not propaganda. It is an all-embracing feature of this matter that from everywhere—the laborer, the salaried man, the farmer, the man in active business who has to compete with tax-exempt securities—comes the cry that they should and must be abolished. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein). That the following article is proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States:

"ARTICLE —.

"SECTION 1. The United States shall have power to lay and collect taxes on income derived from securities issued, after the ratification of this article, by or under the authority of any State, but without discrimination against income derived from such securities and in favor of income derived from securities issued, after the ratification of this article, by or under the authority of the United States or any other State."

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 9, strike out the word "section" and insert "Sec."

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, this is merely a misprint.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be agreed to.

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I have another amendment, which I desire to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GREEN of Iowa: Page 1, line 12, after the word "State," strike out the comma and insert a semicolon.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Was the first amendment adopted?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair said, without objection, the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would like to make some inquiry of the chairman of the committee. I notice in referring to the printed copy of the Constitution where articles include more than one section the word "section" is printed in full. Take article 15. Why should not we conform to that rather than follow the abbreviated style of spelling the word "section"?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The drafting clerk informs me that in the original draft the form is the same as in this amendment, and therefore it was thought best—

Mr. STAFFORD. Here we have with respect to amendments to the Constitution the various sections where the word "section" is spelled out in full and not abbreviated, and why should not we conform to that?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. We do conform—

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman from Washington says every one is that way.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. It may not in the print the gentleman has before him.

Mr. STAFFORD. Here we have the print of the Constitution and in every article containing more than one section the word "section" is printed out in full.

Mr. TILSON. Is the gentleman sure his copy follows the original Constitution?

Mr. STAFFORD. The authority is the manual, and it is copied directly, and I should hold that any person who would take undue liberties by submitting something that has not been adopted by the people—

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Let me call the attention of the gentleman from Wisconsin that in the copy of the resolution in one place the word "section" is spelled "Section," and in the other it is "Sec."

Mr. STAFFORD. Why do not you make them conform?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I do not care which way it is.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa will be agreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. I object and ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the first amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to withdraw the first amendment. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The other amendment is simply the insertion of a semicolon instead of a comma.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Iowa and ask why a semicolon is grammatical and a comma is not. What is the necessity for the amendment?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The amendment is made under the general rules of punctuation that where there are main divisions in the paragraph and some smaller divisions, the smaller divisions are separated by a comma and the main divisions should be separated by a semicolon.

Mr. LONDON. I think it is bad grammar. I think the gentleman's amendment is an infraction of the rules of grammar. A semicolon can not divide a sentence which contains only one subject and only one predicate. Now, the entire section contains one sentence, and there is only one subject and only one predicate, and a semicolon can not split up a sentence. I object to bad grammar. The amendment is bad enough, but why the bad grammar?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I do not agree with the gentleman at all, nor does the drafting clerk.

Mr. LONDON. I think I am right about the grammar, anyway.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Iowa ought to offer some reason why the rule of punctuation is violated. The gentleman from New York is correct. You can not cite any rule of punctuation that would justify what the gentleman proposes to do. With all respect to the gentleman it is absurd to say you are going to separate—

Mr. HERRICK. Is an amendment to the section in order?

The CHAIRMAN. Not until we vote on this amendment.

Mr. TILSON. While on the subject of punctuation I should like to call attention to the punctuation in lines 10 and 11 of the first section. My attention has been called to a possible ambiguity. At the end of line 10 there is a comma after the word "issued." Clearly this clause is meant to refer to securities issued after the ratification of this article, but it is feared that it may be construed to reach back further and made to mean only that after the ratification of this article the United States shall have power to lay and collect taxes on these securities. It makes a great deal of difference which interpretation is put upon it. It ought to be made perfectly clear and certain that it means that it shall apply only to securities issued after the ratification.

Mr. WINGO. If the gentleman will permit, if that is what it is intended to do, apply only to securities issued after the ratification of this article, then the comma, of course, ought to come after the word "securities." As you have got it now after the ratification of this article, then you can tax these securities.

Mr. TILSON. Yes; that is the idea of some who fear that there may be an ambiguity.

Mr. WINGO. If you mean that the limitation shall apply to the time of issue, then your comma ought to come after "securities."

Mr. TILSON. If I understand the meaning intended to be conveyed, it is that this will apply only to securities issued after ratification.

Mr. WINGO. If you think that, do not you think the comma should come after "securities"?

Mr. TILSON. I wish to have the comma come in at the right place to make it mean securities issued after the ratification, and I wish to have no uncertainty about the meaning of the constitutional amendment. That is the reason why I have directed my inquiry to the gentleman in charge of the bill, so that it may be made very clear and express just what it means.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, there are two contingencies applied to the securities issued: First, that they shall be issued after the ratification of this article; second, by or under the authority of any State. The punctuation, except as proposed to be corrected by the amendment that I have offered, is correct, as is believed unanimously by the drafting bureau. This House has always heretofore accepted the conclusions of the drafting bureau about matters of punctuation. I think the meaning is perfectly clear, and it can not be construed the other way.

Mr. TILSON. What is the meaning? I should like to have the gentleman state it for the RECORD.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I can not understand fully the difficulty under which the gentleman from Connecticut labors.

Mr. TILSON. I should like to have the gentleman's construction placed in the RECORD, so that hereafter, if necessary, it can be used in construing this amendment.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I have just stated that there are two limitations placed upon the securities issued under the provisions of this amendment, and which may be, first, those issued after the ratification of this article, and, second, by or under the authority of any State.

Mr. TILSON. That is the gentleman's interpretation of it, and that, I understand, is the meaning he intends to convey in this section. Whether the gentleman's interpretation is the correct one or the one that would necessarily be given to it by a court in its interpretation, I do not know. I should like to have it made certain.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. Let me suggest to the gentleman from Connecticut and the gentleman from Iowa that there are two limitations upon the word "securities." "Securities" is the substantive thing you are legislating about. There are two limitations upon the word "securities." One is "issued after the ratification of this article" and the other is "by or under the authority of any State." Now, by putting the comma after the word "issued," what are you doing? You are putting that qualification to the whole thing that goes before the comma, and that is, "The United States shall have power to lay and collect taxes on income derived from securities issued." The word "issued" in that event is mere surplusage. "Securities" is what you are talking about, and I submit in all seriousness that if I know what the gentleman intends, it is that the limitation on the securities should apply after the securities are issued.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. This has been discussed before the committee for months. The limitation is upon the securities issued, upon the word "issued."

Mr. WINGO. No; I think the limitation is upon the securities, not upon the issues.

Mr. TILSON. I suggest the propriety of transposing those two phrases.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. There is a comma after "securities issued" at the end of line 10, and then after the words "securities issued" on line 1 of page 2. Is it intended that these commas shall remain in? You do not intend to keep those commas in, do you?

Mr. TILSON. There is no motion to strike them out, and so I am inquiring as to the meaning of the section with the commas as they are.

Mr. MONDELL. I can get no other meaning except that suggested by the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. TILSON. I confess that my own first interpretation of it was in accord with that of the gentleman from Iowa and the gentleman from Wyoming, knowing that to be the intent of the committee, but the question has been raised by people in whose good judgment I have great confidence, people who have studied this matter, and who contend with able argument and great zeal that there is ambiguity here and liability to misconception.

Mr. MONDELL. What is the ambiguity which these distinguished people have mentioned?

Mr. TILSON. The one referred to by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. Wingo] that the comma after the word "issued," at the end of line 10, carries the meaning of the clause following the word "issued" back to the beginning of the section, so that it will mean only that after the ratification of this article Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes on incomes derived from securities issued by or under the authority of any State; or possibly so that it will refer to income derived from such securities after the ratification of this article. Neither would be the meaning intended by the committee in reporting the resolution.

Mr. MONDELL. I presume the gentleman from Connecticut knows from long experience that gentlemen who are experts never agree, and that you can change this half a dozen times and yet never get the approval of all the objectors.

Mr. TILSON. All I desire is to get it right.

Mr. HERRICK. Mr. Chairman, has this matter been disposed of.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] to insert a semicolon in lieu of a comma after the word "States," in line 12.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute for that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi offers a substitute, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. In line 10 strike out after the word "issued" the comma and insert in lieu thereof the words "by or under the authority of any State." Then it will read as I imagine it is intended to read, "The United States shall have power to lay and collect taxes on income derived from securities issued by or under the authority of any State after the ratification of this article." I do not think it will put all my merit into it, but at least it will have some sense then. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk did not catch the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. In line 10, page 1, after the word "issued" strike out the comma and insert in lieu thereof "by or under the authority of any State." Of course, subsequently in line 11 we should strike out the words "by or under the authority of any State." Or I will suggest that we put it all in one amendment, and after the comma strike out the words "by or under the authority of any State."

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Mississippi send his amendment to the desk in writing? The Clerk can not get it.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. He can get it easily enough.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Would it be in order now to move to send this bill back to the committee, so that they may consider it with a view of getting it into shape to be considered by the Committee of the Whole?

The CHAIRMAN. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The amendment I offer is at the end of line 10, page 1, to strike out the comma and insert in lieu thereof the words "by or under the authority of any State;" and, after the comma in line 11, strike out the words "by or under the authority of any State."

Then it will read as follows:

The United States shall have power to lay and collect taxes on income derived from securities issued by or under the authority of any State after the ratification of this article.

The CHAIRMAN. And what punctuation would the gentleman suggest to follow that?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The comma will still be there.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi offers an amendment which the clerk will report.

The clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi: Page 1, line 10, after the word "issued," strike out the comma and insert the words "by or under the authority of any State"; and in lines 11 and 12, strike out the words "by or under the authority of any State."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the substitute.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, the danger of trying to amend in this kind of a way in Committee of the Whole is very well illustrated by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi. If his amendment should prevail, it would greatly expand the purposes of this constitutional amendment and would do something which I am sure he does not want to do. As he has it, it would read:

Income derived from securities issued by or under the authority of any State after the ratification of this article.

If the gentleman's amendment should prevail and the constitutional amendment in that form should be adopted, we could tax income derived from past issues of securities.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. You can do it under the amendment as it now stands. As it now stands, there is no question but that is what would happen.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. This was all carefully gone over in the committee, and these words were put in the order in which they now are after full consideration.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The way it reads now is:

The United States shall have power to lay and collect taxes on incomes derived from securities issued, after the ratification of this article.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Issued after the ratification?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Oh, no; you shut that off with commas. When shall the United States do that? As soon as this amendment is ratified you can levy a tax on income derived from State securities and Government securities and all other securities which are now exempt from taxation, if you leave it as you have it now.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If you should strike out that comma, there might be something in your contention.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I would like to have it all stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the substitute. It seems to me that the House should not vote hastily to change the words of a constitutional amendment carefully considered by the committee in favor of words which are merely read and which it is impossible to compare with the text of the proposed amendment. I do not say that the gentleman's substitute will accomplish what I propose to suggest, but I do say that if we make the transposition which he demands it is open to the interpretation that the words will refer back to the words "income derived," and that the amendment may then read that the United States may tax incomes derived after the ratification of this amendment. If that be so, then that means that the United States could tax the income from bonds now exempt, and that is not the purpose of this amendment. I do not say that it would accomplish this, but I do say that it is open to that interpretation; and being open to that interpretation, in the future men will claim that interpretation and it will result in litigation.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLS. In one minute. I, for one, though I think this proposition is perfectly correct as it now stands, can see no objection to striking out both of the commas that seem to be giving so much trouble to some of the gentlemen here, in lines 10 and 11, so that the words "after the ratification of this article" will not be separated from the word "issued" nor will they be divorced from the words "by or under the authority of any State." It would be a little clumsy, but it would not be open to any of the objections that have been urged on the floor to-day.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Does not the gentleman think this amendment which has been so carefully considered by the committee, with the comma after the word "issued" and the comma after the word "article," is capable of being interpreted as meaning that after the ratification of this amendment the United States shall have power to lay and collect taxes on securities issued?

Mr. MILLS. If the gentleman asks me the question, frankly, I do not believe it is open to that interpretation.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. If it refers to securities issued after ratification of this article, will the gentleman suggest any reason why the comma should have been inserted there, separating "issued" from "after the ratification"?

Mr. MILLS. As I see it, I would say to the gentleman that you might have included those words "after the ratification of this article" in parenthesis, if so desired. It is a parenthetical clause and obviously should be inclosed in commas, but if the commas bother the gentleman so much I for one am perfectly willing that they should go out, though I think they are correctly there.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, may I suggest the insertion of two words which I think would relieve all obscurity, if there is any. In line 10, if you insert after the word "securities" the words "which are," then you would have it read, "the United States shall have the power to lay and collect taxes on incomes derived from securities which are issued," and so forth.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I have no objection to both commas going out.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that the experts can not agree, I move that both commas be stricken out.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I will withdraw the last amendment in order that the gentleman from Wyoming may address the committee.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, this matter has been very carefully considered by the committee and I am inclined to think that the committee is correct in its phraseology. It might have been phrased somewhat differently but the phraseology is reasonably clear and understandable. I think the committee was also correct from the standpoint of most authorities as far as the punctuation is concerned. Not being an expert on punctuation and not claiming to know over much about these things, I should have left out both commas, the one after the word "issued" in line 10 and the one after the word "article" in line 11. I do not, however, think it makes any material difference. I think it makes it a little clearer, and I am going to ask unanimous consent to strike out the comma after the word "issued" at the end of line 10, page 1, and the comma after the word "article" in line 11.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to amend the resolution as the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MONDELL asks unanimous consent to strike out the comma after the word "issued" in line 10, and also to strike out the comma after the word "article" in line 11.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. DENISON. Reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman from Wyoming a question. If you strike out the comma in line 11, it will then read "issued after the ratification of this article by or under the authority of any State."

Mr. MONDELL. I am not at all insistent. I do not think it makes any great difference, but I thought if we could get an agreement it would be well to do so.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask if this is in accord with the view of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will say that we went over this question time and time again, and discussed it with the drafting bureau, and we punctuated it according to the best advice we could get.

Mr. GARNER. I can not consent to having this changed after the subcommittee has gone over it for month after month with the experts from the Treasury Department and the experts of the drafting bureau. I can not consent to having it changed by unanimous consent. It is a reflection on the committee, and I am not willing to have the record show any such thing. I am a member of the Committee on Ways and Means, and I do not propose to have it reflected upon in any such manner.

Mr. MONDELL. I am glad to know the attitude of the gentleman from Texas. Everyone knows who has had any writing to do that there is a wide difference of opinion in the matter of punctuation. Some folks use few or no commas at all and some scatter them in almost anywhere. The committee has taken the best advice that is obtainable. I think their punctuation is as it should be, but if anybody objects to those two commas, let us take them out. Otherwise I think the resolution should remain exactly as it was presented.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is called for.

Mr. LITTLE rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Kansas rise?

Mr. LITTLE. I rise to get permission to ask a question and reserving the right to object.

The CHAIRMAN. It is too late to reserve the right to object. The regular order has been called for. The question is on agreeing to the substitute amendment proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken, and the substitute amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the original amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN].

Mr. HILL. Let the amendment be reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. GREEN of Iowa: Page 1, line 12, after the word "State," strike out the comma and insert in lieu thereof a semicolon.

Mr. CHALMERS. Mr. Chairman, will another substitute be in order?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this amendment—

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio has the floor.

Mr. CHALMERS. Mr. Chairman, in place of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa to strike out the comma after the word "State," in line 12, I offer a substitute to strike out the comma after the word "State" and substitute a period. Then strike out the words "but without discrimination," in line 12, and substitute "However, the United States shall not discriminate against."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the substitute amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. CHALMERS as a substitute for the amendment offered by Mr. GREEN of Iowa: On page 1, line 12, after the word "State," strike out the comma and insert in lieu thereof a period, and strike out the language "but without discrimination" and insert in lieu thereof "However, the United States shall not discriminate against."

Mr. CHALMERS. Mr. Chairman, the difficulty seems to have been that we have here an involved compound sentence with the subject only in the first member. I am breaking it up into two sentences, putting in a period and putting the subject in the second member. That seems to me to clarify the provision.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate upon this amendment and all amendments thereto be now closed.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the substitute offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The substitute was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MANSFIELD: Page 1, line 11, strike out the words "after the ratification of this article."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARNER. It has been usual heretofore in the House, when in Committee of the Whole, for the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole to at least consider amendments that will likely be offered by members of the committee. I do not desire to cut off anyone else.

The CHAIRMAN. Was the gentleman on his feet desiring to offer an amendment?

Mr. GARNER. I was on my feet asking for recognition. I merely call the attention of the Chair to the situation and ask him at some time to glance in this direction.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was unaware that the gentleman from Texas was on the floor for the purpose of offering an amendment. The Chair will recognize the gentleman as soon as the gentleman from Kansas yields the floor.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, is there an amendment pending?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas rose for the purpose of offering an amendment, which the Clerk is about to report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LITTLE: Page 1, line 10, strike out the comma at the end of the line, and in line 1 on page 2, strike out the comma after the word "issued."

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I wish to make an apology to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER], if I seem to have been trying to take the floor away from him. I thought I had been standing here steadily and frantically trying to get recognition myself.

Mr. GARNER. I am glad that the gentleman obtained recognition.

Mr. LITTLE. It seems to me that it is hard work here to get a little recognition to talk about a stray comma, a little punk punctuation. It seems a very plain, simple question to me. You have a comma after the word "issued," at the end of line 10 on page 1. How it ever got there I do not know. You can not find a well-written English book in the Library that has a comma in such a connection and at such place as that. Just what the effect of it will be one hardly knows off-hand, because nobody ever saw that thing done before with a comma. This is also true about the comma after the word "issued" in line 1 on page 2. One reason I was trying to get recognition was that no one had any interest in this last little comma, which is in exactly the same position as the other.

If we are going to fix it, why not fix this also? If the comma were absent it would mean that they could tax securities issued after the ratification of the article. When you put the comma in you make a change. What is it? You have set off to themselves the words "after the ratification of this article" for some purpose. The comma makes a pause for some reason after the word "issued," a slight pause, long enough to say when, for example. When will they have the power to tax securities? Why, the answer after the comma is, as soon as this article is ratified, of course. If that is not the purpose of the comma, for pity's sake why is it there? If instead of setting off those words between the two commas you had inserted them in the first line after the words "The United States," they would have the same effect as they have now with a comma at each end and would say, "The United States, after the ratification of this article, shall have power to collect taxes on income derived from securities issued." The gentleman from New York [Mr. MILLS] criticized the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS] because it might have that result, but the resolution as it stands now would probably have exactly the same result as would spring from Mr. HUMPHREYS's resolution. Why make a case for the Supreme Court when your resolution will be perfectly plain if you strike out this comma?

If this amendment goes through into the Constitution just as it is written, the law business will become more profitable than it has been for a hundred years. You had better have lawyers, not professors, writing your amendments to the Constitution, gentlemen of the Ways and Means, or punctuating them, rather.

Mr. LONDON. Does anybody know of any reason that dictates this amendment?

Mr. LITTLE. This amendment is presented to strike out the comma and restore the language to what the Ways and Means Committee say they meant. Replying to the suggestion of the learned gentleman from Virginia with regard to the commas in the Constitution interpreted, yes. Just as the Bible was written without punctuation, and just as Homer was written, and just as the English people, formerly at least, read their laws, without reference to commas. If you will look at this you will find that there is no earthly reason for the comma after either of these words, and it can not do any good and it may do a lot of harm. Gentlemen, the simplest and least complicated English is best for the purposes of such legislation. God knows the difficulties in interpreting and applying it will be amply sufficient without these involved and complicated sentences. There is no earthly excuse for having one long sentence in this resolution. Certainly nobody has such pride of authorship as to insist on retaining a wicked and useless little comma that probably will start a prairie fire of litigation unless the Senate cuts it out. If you take the comma out after the word "issued," it would then read:

The United States shall have power to lay and collect taxes on income derived from securities issued after the ratification of this article.

And if you leave that comma in, the resolution will mean:

The United States shall have power, after the ratification of this article, to lay and collect taxes on securities issued.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes; certainly.

Mr. TILSON. As I understand the purport of the gentleman's amendment, it is to strike out the comma after the word "issued" in both parts of the sentence.

Mr. LITTLE. Yes. There is no earthly reason for commas being there. What harm they might do you can not so quickly estimate.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I think the provisions would be construed just the same whether those commas stay in or go out. I move that all debate upon this amendment do now close.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LITTLE) there were—ayes 71, noes 76.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GARNER: Page 2, strike out lines 2, 3, and 4, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "from any other source."

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of the membership of the House to the fact that there are two prints of this proposed amendment from the Printing Office. The one that Mr. GREEN is using and the one they are using at the desk have four lines in the first section of the second page, and I am going to offer in my time another proposed amendment to section 2. I make this explanation so that gentlemen can read on their prints where there are only three lines of section 1 on page 2, so that they may understand the second amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GARNER: Page 2, line 10, strike out all after the word "from" down to and including the word "State" in line 11, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "any other source."

The CHAIRMAN. The second amendment will be considered as pending.

Mr. GARNER. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the House that all I am doing is this—

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman from Texas allow his first amendment to be again reported? We did not get it.

Mr. GARNER. Will the Clerk report the first amendment again?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the first amendment will be again reported.

There was no objection.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. MONDELL. I ask that the gentleman give the words stricken out.

Mr. GARNER. I will ask that the gentleman from Wyoming get a copy of the bill. If he has a copy of the bill which has the print other than the one referred to, the one the Clerk is using and the one Mr. GREEN is using, and he will turn to page

1, strike out all after the word "income." In other words, page 1, I strike out the word "derived."

A MEMBER. What line?

Mr. GARNER. Line 13. You strike out all on page 2 in lines 1, 2, and 3 in place of 2, 3, and 4, after the word "from."

Mr. LONGWORTH. In line 1.

Mr. GARNER. You strike out the words, if you have your print, if the Chair will wait a minute—I do not know what print he has, and not knowing what print I can not tell you what to do. I will read it as amended.

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman will read what is proposed to be stricken out.

Mr. GARNER. All right, I will do it.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. It is absurd to refer to the print at all, if the gentleman will simply give us what he is going to strike out.

Mr. GARNER. If my amendment were adopted, Article I would read as follows.

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman from Texas will follow the suggestion of the gentleman from New Jersey and give us the exact words he proposes to strike out.

Mr. GARNER. I will do that, but one gentleman makes the suggestion that I read it as amended, and another that I read the words stricken out. I will try again.

On page 2 of the print of the bill which most of you have strike out all after the word "from," the language to be stricken out being this—

Securities issued, after the ratification of this article, by or under the authority of the United States or any other State—

And insert after the word "from" the words "any other source," so that it will read:

The United States shall have power to lay and collect taxes on income derived from securities issued, after the ratification of this article, by or under the authority of any State, but without discrimination against income derived from such securities and in favor of income derived from any other source.

Now, I do not know whether the House wants to adopt that amendment or not. Mr. GREEN of Iowa says he does not want to adopt it. But if you do want to limit the power of Congress to tax income from State and municipal bonds at the same rate as income of individuals is taxed, you are compelled to adopt this amendment or a similar one. Now, I am told by the experts of the legislative drafting service that there is an amendment on the desk that will reach the same purpose and have less objection. But to my mind its language is confusing and obscure, and that is the reason I offer the amendment which I am now discussing.

With all due respect to the legislative drafting expert, and he is an expert and deserves much credit for his work in this Congress and in other Congresses, and for one I voted and expect to continue to vote to continue his services, but this is such a technical subject, it has been drawn in such a manner by the committee that nobody can understand it, not even the best grammarian in the House will agree as to what the man who drafted the section means, and I offer a plain amendment that any average man can understand; that is to say, I want to limit the power of Congress to levy on income from United States bonds, county bonds, and municipal bonds the same rate of taxes as is levied upon all other classes of individual income. I think that is what Congress wants to do.

Mr. BUTLER. That is what we want to do.

Mr. GARNER. And I am trying to fix it so the amendment will insure it; and, Mr. BUTLER, unless you do adopt this amendment you will give to the Congress the power to levy ten times as much taxes on income from the city of West Chester's bonds as might be levied upon the salaried income of individuals. Will that be right?

Mr. BUTLER. No; it will break the city of West Chester up.

Mr. GARNER. Why, I do not think you want to do it; and not wanting to do it, I have offered this amendment in order that I may, as far as I can, protect the city of West Chester and other municipalities against a Congress that might want to stop its issues by imposing too heavy a tax, and the record in this case shows that some of the very people who are proposing this amendment want to limit and discourage the issuance of these bonds.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER. I want to fix it so that whenever you levy a high tax on income from State and municipal bonds you will also levy the same rate on other income of individuals and thereby give protection against unfair and dangerous discrimination.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. GARNER. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. I suppose we shall have the benefit of the gentleman's influence to pass the resolution if the gentleman's amendment is adopted?

Mr. GARNER. I will say this to the gentleman, that if you adopt it the House will pass the resolution, and if you do not it will not have much chance.

Mr. MONDELL. How about the vote of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. GARNER. It does not make any special difference about my vote. Results are what you want, I suppose. If you are looking for results, my amendment should be adopted.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. Under the present law, when the 3½ per cent Liberty bonds were issued they were made entirely tax exempt?

Mr. GARNER. They were.

Mr. BLACK. If the gentleman's amendment is adopted it would preclude Congress from writing into future revenue laws a provision that would exempt income from these bonds, it seems to me.

Mr. GARNER. Certainly not. My amendment applies to securities issued after the ratification of the article.

Mr. BLACK. No. The gentleman strikes all that language out.

Mr. GARNER. No; I do not.

Mr. BLACK. The first part of section 1 refers to State obligations which are issued after the ratification of the article.

Mr. GARNER. Yes; and then I go down and deal with Federal obligations issued after the ratification.

Mr. BLACK. The gentleman's amendment is to strike out the part of section 1 found on page 2 of the resolution.

Mr. GARNER. "By and under the authority of the United States"; all right.

Mr. BLACK. The gentleman's amendment does more than that; it strikes out from the section this language, "securities issued after the ratification of this article by or under the authority of the United States or any other State" and inserts in lieu of the language stricken out this language, "income from any other source." These words would include income from the 3½ per cent Liberties. In my judgment, a provision of that kind would nullify the whole effect of the amendment so long as the 3½ Liberties are outstanding.

Mr. GARNER. I am levying taxes now against State securities, am I not?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Then I am going to levy them against State securities at the same rate as is put on income from all other sources.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARNER. This paragraph undertakes to tax incomes from State and municipal securities, does it not?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. I am going to limit the rate that you levy against such income to the same as other income of individuals. In the next section the resolution reciprocates and gives the States the right to levy a tax against the income from United States Government bonds, and I say the State shall not levy a higher tax against the income from Federal Government bonds than it does against any other income of its citizens. Is not that fair?

Mr. BLACK. Yes; that is undoubtedly fair and furnishes the main reason why I am going to vote for the submission of this amendment. But at the same time we can not repudiate the tax exemption which is already in the 3½ Liberties and which is no doubt in some of the State and municipal bonds, and the resolution as now drawn provides for a recognition of these outstanding commitments. If I understand my colleague's amendment, it would not give any recognition to these outstanding commitments and would therefore nullify the whole amendment.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman from Texas undoubtedly does not understand this proposed constitutional amendment, and I do not think there are a dozen men in the House that do. I know that if the gentleman from Texas understood what its effect would be he would not support it, because he is a sound Democrat. I was surprised when I heard his speech to-day in which he stated he favored this resolution. The attempt is being made here to give the Congress the power to levy on the incomes from Federal, State, and county securities more than other income of its citizens, if it sees proper to do it. I want to limit the authority conferred to the same rate of taxation that the taxing power will levy against the gentleman from New York [Mr. MILLS], for example.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER. In just a moment. You say that Congress will never levy a heavier rate of tax on income derived from State and municipal bonds than it levies on other income of individual citizens. Gentlemen, is it possible that you can consider for a moment that you are going to surrender to Congress a power so broad and inclusive because you contemplate it will never be used? Is there a man sitting in front of me who knows of a single amendment to the Constitution that is not being exploited by Congress to the extent of about all it will bear? Do you contend that you will give this power to Congress and it never use it? The idea of investing Congress with a power involves the idea that Congress will use that power. You should not console yourselves, as my colleague [Mr. BLACK] does, with the idea that there is no reason to be alarmed. That may be true in your day, but your children and your grandchildren may rise up and say, "Here is something that makes sure the destruction of our local government by the Federal Government."

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER. Yes.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Does not the evidence of a lack of disposition to limit Congress indicate a purpose on the part of Congress to use the power?

Mr. GARNER. Undoubtedly. If you take the record in this case, if you take Mr. MILLS's speech, if you take the declaration of the Secretary of the Treasury, if you take the message of the President of the United States, you will find that all of them show that the principal purpose of this amendment is that an appeal may be made to Washington to stop this alleged extravagance in the issuance of State and local bonds. In place of trusting your own people, in place of appealing to the communities, and the States through their legislatures to stop this alleged extravagant issue of bonds, they say, "Washington is the easiest place at the present time." But, gentlemen, when you surrender that power once, then it is gone forever. Their sovereignty is gone. Their credit is gone; and I appeal to you that if you are going to surrender the sovereignty, the police power, the credit, the morals—I ask you, what is the necessity of continuing State boundaries?

Mr. MILLS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MILLS. Some 15 minutes ago when I first asked the gentleman to yield, he was mentioning the dangers of not adopting his amendment, and he was stating to the House that unless it was prepared to adopt his amendment the United States Government would find itself in a position to discriminate against State securities in favor of certain individuals.

Mr. GARNER. I did.

Mr. MILLS. I want to ask the gentleman to give us an example of what he has in mind, and to state the class of citizens who could conceivably so profit.

Mr. GARNER. All right. I will take the gentleman from New York, who is as shining an example as you can find here or elsewhere, because he understands taxation as well as any man in the entire country, not only in Congress but in the entire country. He has had both experience and duties to perform. If Congress wanted to stop the city of New York from issuing bonds—and by the way they now have outstanding $1,700,000,000—if Congress wanted to stop what it deemed extravagant issue of bonds by your city, it would meet in session and Mr. GREEN would bring in a bill under this amendment if it was a part of the Constitution, providing that all incomes from securities issued by the Federal or State governments shall pay into the Treasury a tax of 50 per cent. Could you issue any bonds under that?

Mr. MILLS. Yes; because the United States Government would in that same law under the terms of this constitutional amendment have to provide a 50 per cent income tax on every security issued in the country, and so there would be no discrimination.

Mr. GARNER. What other security?

Mr. MILLS. Every security.

Mr. GARNER. Why?

Mr. MILLS. On every security owned by any man.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman from New York does not mean what he says.

Mr. MILLS. I mean every word of what I say, because the gentleman knows that this bill provides that the United States may not only not discriminate in favor of its own securities and that it may not discriminate in favor of the securities issued by any individual State, but that it can not discriminate in favor of any of the securities issued by authority of any State, and that means all corporate securities.

Mr. GARNER. All right.

Mr. MILLS. Therefore if the United States wants to tax the incomes derived from municipal securities at the excessive rate suggested by my friend from Texas, it would in that same law have to tax the income derived from any other securities issued in the United States, and that would mean no discrimination against municipalities. [Applause.]

Mr. GARNER. All right. Would it have to levy the same rate that it levies against a Congressman's salary?

Mr. MILLS. No. And therefore what the gentleman's amendment is intended to do is to prevent the Government of the United States ever discriminating in favor of income earned as contrasted with income derived from securities. [Applause.]

Mr. GARNER. Oh, that is the gentleman's construction of it.

Mr. MILLS. Therefore the gentleman's amendment is a discrimination against the professional man and wage earner and in favor of the man who derives a fixed income from property. [Applause.]

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I hope that I may have at least a part of my time in which to conclude. When the gentleman from New York admits that this amendment will discriminate, will permit Congress to discriminate, he makes the strongest kind of an argument in favor of my amendment to the pending section. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I ask that the gentleman from Texas may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Texas be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I should like to have the other side of this stated.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. GARNER. All right, Mr. Chairman, I will yield the floor to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN].

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, it will not take very long to show how utterly impossible it would be to put this resolution into effect for any purpose if the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] is carried. It provides that the United States shall not discriminate against incomes from any source. In the first place, we have three billion of 3½ per cent bonds outstanding.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for me to make a request for information?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If the gentleman will wait a moment until I get through with this line I will be very glad to yield to him. As I stated, in the first place we have $3,000,000,000 of 3½ per cent bonds out which are entirely exempt from taxation. We could not put this amendment in force until those bonds have been paid up, if the amendment of the gentleman from Texas were adopted. Besides that, we can not at this time levy any tax on the salaries of judges of the various courts. It would take still another amendment to the Constitution to make this resolution of any effect, if the amendment of the gentleman from Texas should prevail. Then, on the other hand, the various States can not now levy any tax on the incomes of Federal officials, and that would require still another amendment. The gentleman says he fears discrimination, that we are going to put a higher tax or might put a higher tax on the incomes from State securities than we would on rents, for example. Does not the gentleman know that if we want to discriminate against these securities, we can do it now?

We can put an extra tax on any of these State or municipal securities that form a part of the estate of a deceased person if we wish to do so without waiting for the adoption of this amendment. We can put a tax on any man who deals in them at the present time, and prevent their being put on the market by investment brokers. Possibly we could also put a tax upon the transfer of these securities which certainly would force them out of existence entirely.

Now, there is another thing. Under our present system we levy a certain tax upon corporations. We provide that dividends from corporations shall be exempt from the normal tax. We would have to revise our whole tax law in that respect if the amendment of the gentleman from Texas were put into effect. We would have to, in fact, revise the whole income tax law, besides the corporation tax law, in order to make it work. The gentleman from Texas says he fears this tax might be abused, and therefore we should put such a limitation on the power that it could not be used at all. The gentleman from Texas really desires to fix the resolution so that it will not have any effect—that is the real purpose of his amendment, and it will have that effect exactly if his amendment prevails. Who is there here that wants to discriminate against the securities of the State? Time and time again the proposition to discriminate against them by these taxes has come up and been suggested to the Ways and Means Committee, but the proposition has been rejected because it was deemed that a discriminatory tax was unfair. You can not limit the amendment in the manner proposed by the gentleman from Texas without absolutely nullifying it. The statement of the Secretary of the Treasury to that effect is positive. Why do we need anything of this kind to hold in check the representatives of the State themselves against imposing undue taxes on the inhabitants of the State whom they represent? The contention is absurd. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, this constitutional amendment is very carefully drafted with one particular end in view. True, it gives to the Federal Government the right to tax the income from State and municipal securities, but it guards the credit of the State and municipality by very carefully providing that the Federal Government can not discriminate against those securities. If there be no discrimination, there can be no undue restrictions on credit. If you do not tax any securities, they are all on a par. If you then levy a 5 or 6 per cent income tax on all securities—State, municipal, and industrial—they are still on the same basis and you do not in any way injure the credit of the State.

This amendment is so carefully drafted that the Federal Government not only can not discriminate in favor of its own securities, but it can not discriminate in favor of the securities of any State, or of any industrial securities, or any public utility, or any other securities issued by any corporation throughout the United States. Therefore the United States can not under any conceivable circumstances discriminate against State or municipal securities, and can not in any conceivable way injure the credit of the State or municipality. Therefore the quotations which the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE] read this morning from statements made by the distinguished Secretary of State do not apply to this constitutional amendment but to the sixteenth amendment as he read it, which did not contain any of these limitations with reference to discrimination and the other safeguards which have been outlined here this afternoon.

Now, my friend from Texas [Mr. GARNER] has been driven hard to pick a flaw in this constitutional amendment because it has been so carefully guarded, and he says let us amend it so that the United States can not discriminate in favor of income derived from any source. But when I asked him to illustrate what he meant he was finally driven to one possible discrimination that the United States might exercise in favor of earned incomes as contrasted with incomes derived from property. But if that be so, then that is an argument not in favor of the gentleman's amendment but in opposition to it, because if there is one right the Federal Government and the State government should reserve, it is the right some day to make a discrimination in favor of the man who earns his income as compared with the man who derives it without any effort from property inherited or acquired in some other way.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLS. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Is not the income of corporations earned income, and under the gentleman's argument could not the Government discriminate in favor of corporations against the State bonds?

Mr. MILLS. Very clearly not.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLS. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Does the gentleman consider the income of interest on money loaned to an individual on a note earned income or unearned?

Mr. MILLS. The gentleman knows that in a previous debate I stated that there were one or two examples—one of rent—in which there could be a discrimination, but you have got to weigh that in opposition to the tremendous advantage to be derived from distinguishing between earned and unearned income. But the thing that surprises me most, however, is that the gentleman has already announced that when we come to section 2, in the interest of consistency, he is going to offer the same amendment. Then we will have the amazing spectacle of the gentleman opposing this constitutional amendment in the name of State rights actually proposing to amend it so as to put the States into a strait-jacket. [Applause.]

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLS. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. They have what they call "call loans" in New York.

Mr. MILLS. Yes; and elsewhere.

Mr. GARNER. Is the interest derived from these "call loans" earned or unearned income?

Mr. MILLS. That would be earned income because it is derived by men whose business it is to make these loans. It is a part of their current business.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from New York may be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, as this constitutional amendment now stands the States are granted the privilege of taxing the income from Federal securities. The State can get that privilege by not discriminating against them as compared with its own securities. If we adopt the amendment suggested by my friend from Texas [Mr. GARNER], what is going to happen to the great majority of the States that do not have an income tax law and that tax all securities on a property basis? If the gentleman's amendment be adopted, in order to reach the billions of dollars or that proportion of the billions of dollars of Federal securities located within their borders they will have to abandon their general property tax and go to an income tax. In other words, if you adopt the gentleman's amendment the Congress of the United States will be dictating to the States of this Union what form of taxation they must adopt in order to reach personal property, and many of these States, I will say to the gentleman from Texas, can not do it under their constitutions, so that we are going to say to the States: "If you want to avail yourselves of this reciprocal privilege, if you want to tax securities of the United States Government held by your citizens, you have to repeal your present constitution, repeal your property tax and adopt an income tax, and when you adopt that income tax you can not adopt an income tax of your own choosing, because the gentleman from Texas in the name of State rights has provided in this Federal amendment the kind of income tax that you citizens of the States must pass. You must pass an income tax, for instance, in which you do not discriminate between earned and unearned income, you must pass an income tax in which you do not discriminate as between dividends and interest upon bonds."

In other words, what my friend from Texas is proposing to do in the name of State rights is to destroy the most fundamental right possessed by the States to-day—the right to levy its own taxes in its own way. So that I say, and I say it without hesitation, that both from the interest of the National Government and of the States—but much more, because of the vital interest of the States—the gentleman's amendment should be rejected without question by every man, whether he believes either in a strong centralized Government or in State rights. [Applause.]

Mr. LANKFORD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am very much in favor of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER]. I am, however, opposed to the resolution as a whole. The Garner amendment only makes it less objectionable. If this resolution passes, the State of New York can not discriminate against securities issued by the National Government and in favor of its own securities—that is, securities issued by New York—but New York will be taxing securities issued in Michigan, Nevada, and other States.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANKFORD. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Is the gentleman aware that the State of New York can now tax bonds of other States held by its own citizens?

Mr. MILLS. Yes; and we do.

Mr. LONGWORTH. A property tax and every kind of a tax.

Mr. LANKFORD. If this is done, it should be remedied. I shall later, before this resolution is voted upon, offer an amendment for this purpose.

At this time I wish to address myself more fully to the merits of the original resolution.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, should there be a constitutional amendment preventing the issuance of tax-exempt securities in the future? Yes is the answer that suggests itself to the average man. None of us who are poor are in favor of relieving the multimillionaires of the Nation from taxation. The idle rich have no right to avoid paying their share of the expenses of the Government. So at first blush it would seem that we can not escape the conclusion that the resolution to do away with tax-exempt securities should be passed. I confess the question has given me very serious concern, not because I found very great trouble deciding what is right, to my mind, but because I found many of my best friends at variance with my ideas on the question.

I have spent much time weighing the arguments of my friends and viewing the question from every angle and I find that much that appears at first to be argument in favor of the resolution falls and will not stand the acid test of close analysis. The bitterest pills bear the thickest coats of sugar. The most vicious bills offered here bear the prettiest and most attractive titles and oftentimes appear to be in behalf of the great common folks when, as a matter of fact, they are designed for the undoing of the great common people. "All is not gold that glitters." Those of us who are poor and represent the great masses of laboring men and farmers may not agree among ourselves as to whether or not this resolution should pass, some favoring it and some opposing it; but I find that every millionaire in this House is for the resolution. Every Member here who votes every time for the big rich and to relieve the big rich of all the taxes possible is for this resolution. I wonder why? The forces which would if possible put a sales tax into effect, thus saddling millions of dollars of taxes annually on the backs of the poorest of the poor and who would gladly relieve the big rich of surtaxes, are for this bill. Why, oh why is this true? The men who believe that the big rich are the great benefactors of the race and that all legislation should be shaped for their special benefit are for this bill. The men who believe that the common folks are only good to work and produce for the big rich profiteers of the country are for this bill. Those who believe that the common folks should pay the taxes and fight the wars are for this bill. Have the big rich and their champions here suddenly had a change of heart? Have they decided to legislate for the poor and to make themselves pay more taxes? If so, then certainly the millennium is at hand.

One of my good Democratic friends the other day in arguing for this resolution said he, too, was worried and wondered why those who always fight for the big rich now are for this resolution, and finally said he had decided that this millionaire crowd had decided to act this way for patriotic reasons and that he was going to vote with them this time. The big rich will admit that they are influenced by patriotic motives.

The only trouble, Mr. Chairman, is that the brand of patriotism of the big rich means to take care of the big rich, while many of us here, thank God, have the brand of patriotism which impels us to legislate for the common folks as best we can, God being our helper. The Washington Daily News in an editorial in its issue of January 16 last so fully expressed my apprehensions until I must quote that editorial, which is as follows:

WHY SO HORRIFIED?

For many days Representative OGDEN L. MILLS, millionaire representative of New York's financial aristocracy, has been telling a committee of the House all about the horrors of tax-exempt securities.

But OGDEN is no "voice in the desert crying alone." No, indeed. He is ably seconded by multimillionaire Secretary of the Treasury Andrew Mellon, by many of Mr. Mellon's friends and partners, by the Western Farm Mortgage Association, another multimillionaire concern; by the National City Bank, the Morgan interests, the Kuhn-Loeb interests, the Saturday Evening Post, the Wall Street Journal, and a host of other "tribunes of a downtrodden proletariat."

Why all this sudden and tender solicitude for the common people? Why this sudden hatred of the wealthy by the rich? What has happened?

Well, friends, admitting there are two sides to this question, we desire to offer the following facts in extenuation of the principle of tax-exempt municipal and State securities—a principle which seems to lack press agents just now.

If there had been no tax-exempt securities, San Francisco would still be in the throes of a corrupt, inefficient, and nerve-wrecking street car monopoly; Los Angeles would be buying water and hydraulic power from a private monopoly, as many less-favored cities are doing; Detroit would have no municipal street railroad; there would be mighty few State or county paved highways; and the electric power of the future would be securely held "in trust" by the first friends of Messrs. OGDEN MILLS, Mellon, et al.

These rich lovers of the common folk may be perfectly pure in their protestations, but somehow we're suspicious of the whole Greek gift-bearing outfit.

Ah, Mr. Chairman, this bill has a good name but is afflicted with secret vices which everlastingly condemn it. It is sugar-coated, but when the sugar melts away it will be found to be a bitter pill. There is a "nigger in the woodpile" somewhere.

Many of those parading as the friends of the common folks are only "in sheep's clothing, but inwardly are ravening wolves." Let us quit calling the bill by its pretty name. Let us see what it really is. Let us scrape off the sugar and examine the pill and see how bitter it is and decide whether or not we want to take it.

It may be sugar-coated and yet contain too much arsenic or strychnine for use. The question is not, Shall the idle rich pay taxes? If this resolution passes, there will be just as many idle rich as were before its passage. As a general proposition, this bill will not hurt the idle rich. They will still be rich and still be idle. When they are not idle they are planning and scheming to profiteer on and steal either directly or indirectly from the great mass of common people. I much prefer an idle band of thieves and robbers rather than a busy band. This is fast becoming a nation of profiteers and financial crooks. Especially is this true among the big rich. The argument is made here that the man who makes a hundred thousand dollars a year profits, or $500,000 a year, or even several million dollars a year profits by financial manipulation, profiteering, or plundering the great common consuming public should be taxed lightly and should receive at our hands the tenderest consideration and care; and that the man or woman who does not profiteer, but who loans his or her money at 4 or 5 per cent to build schoolhouses, to drain wet lands, to reclaim arid lands, to build good roads, to pay the expenses of a city, county, or State, should be classed as idle rich and a special amendment to the Constitution adopted so as to mulct him or her in taxes.

It is urged that special congressional consideration should be given the speculator who makes unconscionable profits out of nitrates which the farmers buy; who makes millions out of the coal which a shivering, freezing, country of men, women, and children need, and who pile up immensely his ill-gained profits by inflating the price of calcium arsenate and everything which a farmer must buy and use to make a crop, and who, still not satisfied, makes a middleman's enormous profit out of the farmer's crop and leaves the farmer nothing but debts and an enslaved family. It is urged that this profiteer is a great benefactor of the race and deserves the plaudits of a thankful populace, and that the man of money is a bad man who does not profiteer, but who buys farm-loan bonds yielding him 4½ per cent and thus furnishes money at a low rate of interest to the farmers of our Nation. Is the profiteer the patriot and the man whose money at a low rate of interest is saving our people the financial slacker? I think not. Who was the patriotic, good citizen during the recent Great War? The man, woman, or child who bought war savings stamps and Liberty bonds to the last dollar, until it hurt, or the individual who said, "No; I will not put my money in Liberty bonds; I will use it. I will profiteer and grow rich off of my country's misfortune. I will pile up my millions of money while there is grief and anguish everywhere and while the children of men are dying by the millions." Do you think that this Government did very bad wrong when it did not inflict a penalty in the form of a tax on the people whom the Government begged and almost forced to buy Liberty bonds? Do you think that the Government ought to go to its citizens and beg for funds when we are in the midst of an awful war and yet say to the citizens of this country, "If you loan your money to the Government, the same Government which you help will punish you by a tax for doing what the Government so anxiously seeks?"

The Government would say, "Yes, I will punish you for helping with your money and I will let the greedy taxgatherers of New York and other big commercial centers also punish you." The Government would say, "I need money. Loan me your money; I promise you 5 per cent interest but I reserve the right to tax your bonds so as to take all or a part of your interest. I may charge even a part of your principal as taxes, and I will then deliver you to the big commercial centers for the infliction of further penalties in the form of taxes." Many people even believed that the Government should have made Liberty bonds a form of money and kept them worth their face value instead of allowing them to sell for less than par for a long time.

The Government could well have offered to spend a little money to keep these bonds stabilized at par so the people who bought them would not lose on them rather than injure them still further by taxation. Alexander Hamilton, the first Treasurer of our Nation, in 1795, speaking of the Government taxing its own indebtedness, made a statement as follows:

To tax the funds is manifestly either to take or to keep back a portion of the principal or interest stipulated to be paid.

To do this, on whatever pretext, is not to do what is expressly promised; it is not to pay that precise principal or that precise interest which has been engaged to be paid. It is, therefore, to violate the promise given to the lender.

But is not the stipulation to the lender with a tacit reservation of the general right of the legislature to raise contributions on the property of the State?

This can not be supposed, because it involves two contradictory things—an obligation to do and a right not to do; an obligation to pay a certain sum and a right to retain it in the shape of a tax.

It is against the rules, both of law and reason, to admit by implication in the construction of a contract a principle which goes in destruction of it.

The Government by such a construction would be made to say to the lender: "I want a sum of money for a national purpose, which all the citizens ought to contribute proportionately, but it will be more convenient to them and to me to borrow the money of you. If you will lend it, I promise you faithfully to allow you a certain rate of interest while I keep the money and to reimburse the principal within a determinate period, except so much of the one and the other as I may think fit to withhold in the shape of a tax."

Is such a construction either natural or rational? Does it not, in fact, nullify the promise by the reservation of a right not to perform it?

Speaking further along this same line, Mr. Hamilton, the Treasurer during Washington's administration, said:

Suppose the Government to contract with an individual to convey to him a hundred acres of land upon the condition of paying a hundred dollars. When he came to pay the $100 and demand his title could the Government require of him to pay $50 more as a tax upon the land before it would consent to give him the title? Who would not pronounce this to be a breach of contract, a fraud, which nothing could disguise?

This case is parallel with that under examination, with circumstances that fortify the right of the lending creditor.

The Government agrees with him that for $100, which he delivers to the Government, it will deliver to him at the end of each year $6. Here the $6 to be delivered answer to the land to be conveyed, with this stronger ground of right, that the consideration for them has actually been given and received. Yet when the creditor comes to demand his $6 he is told that he can not have them except with the reservation of $1 as a tax upon the $6, or that he can not have them except upon the condition of returning $1 as that tax. What is this but to say that his title to the money in this case, as to the land in the other, must depend upon his paying or allowing a further consideration for it not contemplated in the contract? Can there be a doubt that this also would be a breach of contract, a fraud?

Again, Mr. Hamilton, in discussing the advisability of the Government taxing its own securities, hit the keynote of the situation. From his report I quote the following:

But without undue refinement the lender of money to the public may be affirmed to have paid his tax when he lends his money.

Relying upon the engagement of the Government, express or implied, that he will receive what is promised him without defalcation, he is content with a less interest than he would take if subject to any such defalcation, and especially if it was to be arbitrary as to its extent. In this lower rate of interest he may be truly said to pay his tax or to purchase an exemption from it.

Here also we find what is decisive on the point of expediency.

If the Government had a right to tax its funds, the exercise of that right would cost much more than it was worth. The money lender would exact exorbitant premiums, not only as an indemnification for the use which the Government might probably make of its right, and which, in practice, would be likely to be qualified by some regard to equality of contribution but as an equivalent for insurance against the risk of possibility of a more extensive use. Hence the Government would be likely to pay much more in premiums upon its loans than it would draw back in taxes; and the former being supposed but equal to the latter, there would be no advantage in exercising the right.

But it will be, perhaps, more safe to affirm that there would be no borrowing at all upon such terms. The first precedent of a tax upon the funds might be expected to compel the Government to an express renunciation of the right in every future loan. Solid capitalists would not be much inclined to adventure their money upon so precarious a footing as is implied in a power of taxing their credits.

So it may be safely said that the so-called tax-exempt securities are exempt only because the purchaser of them paid his tax when he bought them. Because they are exempt the purchaser pays more for them. If they were not exempt, he would hold back enough money not only to pay all his taxes on the bonds but enough to pay him for the risk of an increased rate in the future. Taxes are hard to collect. When a purchaser of a bond pays a bonus when he purchases there is no doubt about that tax or profit being paid. One tax that the Government, the State, the municipality, the country gets in full without cost or expense of collection is the extra amount paid by purchasers for the so-called exempt bonds. Others may hide their property, not so with the purchaser of National, State, county, or municipal bonds. Others may delay the payment of their taxes. Not so with the purchaser of these bonds. They are tax free because the taxes were paid in full promptly and without question at the time they were sold.

All property is tax free after all taxes have been paid on that property. Tax-exempt securities are tax free because all taxes have been paid on them. So the so-called idle rich are not dodging taxes by buying farm-loan bonds, school bonds, drainage or municipal bonds so much as you heard they were, are they? Why not let the purchaser of these bonds pay the taxes on these sort of bonds when he buys them? If he does not pay a premium at the time he buys the bonds and thus, then, and there pay his taxes, he will play safe and hold back more than enough to pay all taxes demanded of him on these bonds in the future. If there is any way of escape which he can possibly find, he will probably avail himself of it and never pay in as taxes the money he held out to use in payment of taxes. Untold millions of notes and securities in hands of the very wealthy are concealed and dodged about and no taxes whatever paid on them. Here is where the big rich escape taxation. They do not escape by buying bonds and paying their taxes in advance. All they do is simply get through with the tax proposition once and for all.

Why should he not be allowed to do this? He may pay slightly less in some instances. It is at least certain. In many cases if he does not pay when he buys he will never pay. In all cases, even if the purchaser of Government bonds pays later all he held back at the time of the purchase, the Government in the end gets less, much less, for the Government must pay the expense of collecting this tax. Again, the Government will also lose millions of interest, for the Government will lose the use of the money between the time the purchaser of the bonds buys the bond and the time the Government collects as taxes the money held back by the purchaser for the purpose of paying taxes. A definite amount of taxes collected is worth much more than a larger amount which may never be collected, and if collected must be collected later at great cost.

A bird in the hand is worth two in the bush.

The United States Government can not possibly gain anything by taxing its own bonds and by allowing the States in which those bonds are owned to tax them. The man buying the bond will hold back every cent he has to pay the United States as a tax. The Government will lose the interest on this money while it is held back and will have to pay some one to try to collect it later, and may never get it. Then, again, the bond purchaser will also hold back enough of this bond money to pay the taxes in his home State of New York, Massachusetts, Illinois, or Pennsylvania. The bond purchaser will not be hurt. He will play safe. He will pay less for his bonds. He will hold back a nice, fat sum and use it. The Government may or may not get at great expense less than half of what is held back; the other half he keeps, unless his State gets it. If his State gets it he is still playing safe, for it goes to his beloved New York, or Massachusetts, or other big commercial State, and helps to lessen the other taxes he and other bondholders must pay.

Practically all Government bonds are held by citizens of New York, Boston, Chicago, Philadelphia, and other great northern cities. If this resolution passes, these money centers will reap a rich harvest; but where will Georgia and other such States come in? They will be doing the paying, as they have always done. The Government will be trying to sell a few million dollars of farm-loan bonds to get money to loan to Georgia farmers, and the buyer will be holding back five to ten dollars on the hundred dollars, fifty to one hundred on the thousand dollars, and $50,000 to $100,000 on the million dollars to be used for taxes, part to New York State or other wealthy States where the bonds are sold. Where does the Southern and Western States come in? Where does the farmer come in? I repeat they will do the paying.

The farmers who get money from our present rural-credit system, or from any credit system, will pay the taxes by paying a higher rate of interest. They must pay a higher rate for the Government will be getting less for the bonds and must charge a higher rate. The farmers who borrow from private loan companies will also be paying a tax which will never go to the Government, but will go as loan commissions to lawyers and as high interest to big life insurance companies and other big concerns which make long-term loans to farmers. If we pass legislation which makes the rural-credit system of the Government charge higher interest, all other concerns will do the same. If we can only pull the rate of loans of the Government loan system down, others will be forced to come down. It is estimated that only one dollar out of every twenty now loaned to the farmers on long-term loans are loaned by the Government agencies, but that one-twentieth is large enough to effect mightily the rate of interest of all loans. It controls the rate of interest. For God's sake, let us not do anything to run up the interest rate of money the farmers must have. For every dollar the Government gets out of farm-loan bonds as taxes the buyer will hold back two or more, and for every dollar the farmer loses who borrows through the rural-credit system 20 other farmers will each lose a dollar while borrowing from private long-term loan companies. One farmer in borrowing $100 pays $5 interest to the Government as taxes and $5 indirectly to the State of New York or Massachusetts as a tax, and also at the same time interest rates are held up and 20 other farmers who can not yet get a Government loan and must get a private loan each pay $10 extra, or $200 extra. In other words, the Government of the United States would get less than $1 out of every $40 lost by the farmers of the Nation by this bill. How can anybody who loves the man who tills the soil and who sees this bill in its true light vote for it? Men here who love the farmers of the Nation and favor this resolution are, to my mind, the worst mistaken that honest men have ever been on an important issue.

Several folks have asked me why the big rich favor this resolution with this pretty name, which provides for the taxation of tax-exempt securities and which, some say, means to tax the idle rich. I have demonstrated that the purchasers of bonds in the future have all to gain and nothing to lose. Then, again, many of these future purchasers are also interested in life insurance companies and other wealthy corporations, which will be loaning money all the time at a high rate of interest to the farmers. Everyone who stops to think knows full well why the big loan concerns are so anxious about this resolution. They are deathly afraid of the Government farm loan system. They are afraid it will take their loans away from them, and they are still more alarmed lest the rate of interest which is so dear to their hearts will be forced down.

The wealthy men in Congress, in the President's Cabinet, and in the Nation mean to not only cripple the rural credit system of our Nation but are determined to strangle it to death. They are waging a campaign of propaganda which has no other purpose than to kill the present rural credit system and prevent any future credit system for the farmers which would insure cheaper money for the farmers with less red tape and less delay. They mean to strangle to death any and all cooperative marketing systems which may now or hereafter seek money by the sale of bonds. If they succeed in this the middleman will still reap a rich profit from the products of the farm which he did not produce, and the producer and consumer will as heretofore still suffer—the producer getting too little, the consumer paying too much, the middleman getting that which rightfully is not his. This resolution, if passed, will hinder very much any and all efforts to work out a system of drainage of the low, wet lands of my section of Georgia and other similar sections. I am very anxious about this reclamation of the wet lands of my section and of all sections. It means so much to my section. Irrigation bonds of the West will sell for less and irrigation projects will suffer.

There is an effort to get a drainage program through now, along the same line as that followed in irrigating the arid lands of the West. I look with alarm upon any move which means the death knell of that program, which so many of us here hope to finish in the near future. Mr. Chairman, the more I study the effects of this resolution, the more vicious they appear. The resolution stripped of its pretty name is unworthy of consideration, and would have no support except the big rich who will profit so much by the measure. Think what will happen. The big rich, who already have bonds which can not be taxed now even if this resolution passes, will be greatly benefited, for it can only apply to future purchasers of bonds, and present owners know that if this resolution passes it can not reach them, and they owning all the tax-exempt securities which will ever be issued, will reap millions and millions of dollars of unearned profits as their bonds soar upward on the market. Another class of big rich, who favor very much this resolution, is composed of those who loan money to the farmers and want no competition. The profiteering multimillionaires of the Nation, who make $100,000 a year profits and up to millions of dollars of profits, favor very much this resolution, because they hope to get some of the surtaxes off of their ill-gained profits. The millionaire crowd, who are so much for this resolution, are the ones who are fighting hardest for a reduction of taxes on incomes of over $100,000 a year. They are not fighting for a reduction of income taxes on the fellow who makes a few thousand. A man must be getting a hundred thousand or more a year income before this crowd begs for him. This resolution if passed will not help the man who pays a small income tax. It will not help the man who pays no income tax. It is a move by the big rich for the big rich and against the poor man and the common folks. Another class of people who favor this bill is composed of large taxpayers of the big money centers. All bonds are sold largely in the big money centers and will be taxed there.

The taxes raised in New York and other money centers on Government bonds and bonds of other States held and owned there will run into millions and will lower tax rates on other property in those States. People in my State of Georgia buy very few bonds, and thus could raise no considerable amount of money from taxes on bonds issued in the future and sold in Georgia. It simply means that the people of Georgia are to get less for all bonds sold by the State, by her people, by her cities, and by her counties, and that her farmers are to suffer as the farm-loan bond sells below par, and all this to help the big rich, as heretofore. It means that my State and the States of yours, my friends from the South and West, are to pay part of the taxes of New York, Boston, Chicago, and other money centers.

Did some one say they were puzzled and wondered why the big rich were for this bill? I think I know, and I know they—the big rich—know. Oh, my friends, if we could only secretly hear some of the multimillionaire crowd explain to the rest of them the features of this bill at some of their social functions, when no one is near except the big rich, we would hear a very different speech from what they put in the papers and very different from what their leaders say here in Congress. Mr. Chairman, I believe I can make here one of the speeches one of this rich crowd would make to his fellows. See if I miss it much. He would say, "Fellow suffering millionaires, draw nigh unto me and listen while I explain a matter of importance to you. There are many more of the class who are not rich than there are of our beloved and much favored big rich, but we have controlled and we can control, for we have the money, and money is power. We have lost to a certain extent our grip on the situation. We have made our money out of the common folks of the South and West—out of laboring men and the farmer. We have received big interest on our money from them. We have made enormous profits out of the products of the farm, as we bought them at our own prices and sold them at our own prices to a freezing, naked, starving, consuming people. We have controlled prices. We have manipulated finance, and the profits have been great, and we are the elect. We have made the common people pay, either directly or indirectly, nearly all the taxes. We have controlled, manipulated, and profited. Why not? We have the money and money is power. We let the common folks do the toiling, slaving, and paying. Why not? They can expect nothing else. They have no money. They have no power. Things have gone a little wrong, though."

"The laboring man is demanding more and is getting more than ever before. The farmer is demanding more and getting more than ever before. There is a rural credit system backed by the Government which is getting our loan business and lowering interest rates on the loans we keep. The Government is selling tax-free bonds in order to help this system. The Government is figuring on tax-free bonds to injure us in other ways, such as additional credits for farmers, additional marketing facilities, and may go to the extent of adopting Henry Ford's Muscle Shoals plan or some other similar plan, thus insuring cheaper nitrates to the farmers, but at the same time injuring very seriously our friends who make so much money out of Chilean nitrates and out of supplying the fertilizers of the country. Again much of our money is paid to the Government as taxes on the honest millions we make and the Government is actually letting the States have much of this money to build roads."

"The people of the rural sections of the South and West are building schoolhouses, irrigating dry lands, and beginning to plan very seriously for further drainage of swamp lands. The taxes on our beloved millions of profits is very heavy and is out of proportion to what is assessed against people who do not serve this country by amassing millions each year. In fact, people who make only a few hundred dollars a year or only a few thousand dollars a year pay no income tax. Then again, the very idea of it, the people with large families are generally relieved of all income taxes. But," says this millionaire, talking to his beloved fellow millionaires, "a better day is coming, unless I am very much mistaken." Says he, "We are fighting every inch of the ground and now we have in Congress a resolution to prevent the issuance of tax-exempt securities and to tax the idle rich. It has a pretty name, hasn't it? Ha! Ha! 'Aye, springs to catch woodcocks.'"

"But, brother sufferers in the millions, speaking confidentially, very confidentially, here is what it is and here is what it does. It does not hurt those of us who own now millions of bonds, as no law passed in future can affect bonds sold before its passage; in fact, these bonds will increase in value and we will, in the twinkling of an eye, make for us many, many millions the minute the amendment is ratified." (Just here is loud applause in the Millionaires' Club.) Further speaking, the millionaire says: "Those of us who buy bonds in the future can fully protect ourselves by holding back sufficient funds." (Just here there are many cries in the club of "You bet." "You bet we can.") Again the speaker says: "The measure means that when the farmer borrows from the rural-credit system of the Government he will pay much more as interest and we will hold this extra money and may pay half of it to the dear U. S. A. or we may keep it. The other half goes to the dear old New York State of ours. The poor boobs who sell bonds will not get any tax, for they will not have any bonds to tax. They will be paying the tax when we buy their bonds. We will be the trustees. We will hold the funds. It simply means more interest for us in every way," says the rich speaker. "It means more profits and less taxes. We can get the high surtaxes reduced when this bill is passed. The measure is simply a monkey wrench in the rural-credit system, in the proposed and growing marketing system, in the good-roads schemes, in the better-schools movement, in the irrigation and drainage programs, and in every move to make us lose any of our rights. We have all to gain and nothing to lose." (Just here there is prolonged, loud, and vociferous applause, with the millionaires all standing as the speaker resumes his seat.)

Mr. Chairman, I venture the assertion that I have not in this picture missed very far what has happened and what is happening. As I see it there are so many reasons why this bill should not pass. Millions and millions of tax-exempt bonds have been issued and the money arising from them has been used to build up the North and East. These bonds can never be taxed, it matters not what bills may pass. We can only reach the future. Why should we now endeavor to put a burden on the money the South and West must use if these sections are to develop as we hope for them to develop?

My district, for instance, will need much money in the future to be used in rural credits, in marketing, in drainage, and in numerous other ways. Why should we now tax the very credit by which my people and your people are to live and grow? Other sections have developed without this burden. Why start now? Why begin on my section? Why begin just when we are so anxious for the farming sections to grow and develop? They must grow to a large extent on a credit. Why tax our credit? Why tax the credit of our cities, the credit of our counties, of our State, and of our Nation? Credit is oftentimes worth more than money. A city, county, or State may have little or no money but a good credit. Why should the National Government be given the right to tax the credit of the States or its subdivisions? Why should the State be given the right to tax the credit of the United States? Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee expressed so forcibly my views on this floor on December 19 last, when he said:

There is a phase much more fundamental, gentlemen of the House, than the economic question. This is a proposition to commingle with the powers of the State and the Federal Government in a manner which no amendment ever yet adopted, or ever proposed so far as I know, has attempted to do. It is designed by this amendment, sir, to give to the Federal Government a certain power, and it may amount to a power of life and death over the credit of the States. [Applause.] On the other hand it is proposed—and herein comes the commingling—to give to the States a certain power which it is possible in the development of human society may reach the point where the States will possess the power of life and death over the credit of the Federal Government. Neither of these conditions is desirable from my standpoint. [Applause.]

Chief Justice John Marshall said:

The right to tax is the right to destroy.

Why should either branch of the Government be given the right to destroy the other? If this resolution passes, the big money centers where bonds are sold will have power to absolutely destroy other sections of the Nation. Why should people of other States, of the North and East, who do not know my people, who are not familiar with their customs, and who do not like them, have the power to destroy my people? Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania, in speaking on this resolution, said:

This right of a sovereign State to control the issue of its securities, to regulate its taxes, is a fundamental right and one necessary to its very existence. [Applause.] If you invade that right, you destroy the sovereignty of the State.

Gentlemen, if we are going to do this, let us obliterate all State lines and make of this a strong central Government. "Oh," they say, "we want to check these municipal departments from issuing freely, too freely perhaps, these securities." What? Transfer to another and a foreign jurisdiction the right to say what shall be issued for a local improvement? Who is there that can better be trusted than the people in the different localities? Home rule there is an essential element of safety and security.

There is no argument in the statement that this is a refuge for the rich. As my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. CRAIG] said, if a rich man wants to pay the penalty at the beginning and invest money in bonds that are tax free, with a very limited income, let him do it. But they say "You are diverting this money from the industries of the States." The money must come from some source and must be used. What for? Why, in maintaining the government, managing and developing the institutions, and the developments and improvements of the community. And what better use could the money be put to than that?

It is urged that money put into bonds is tied up and its use lost to the country. Let us see about that. Several million dollars go into farm-loan bonds. The buyer of the bonds gets a piece of paper; the money, far from becoming idle, goes into the hands of the farmers, on to the merchants, the bankers, the laborers, and then on to the wholesale men and the big banks and proves a benediction to all. So it is with all money obtained for bonds. The money does not become idle. It gets very busy helping thousands of people. Yet the great desire of those who favor this resolution is not to raise taxes so much as to stop the loaning of money at all on any form of municipal, public improvement, county, or farm-loan bond. They all want to tax these bonds so as to stop them. Openly they favor killing the credit of the United States, the States, and its subdivisions. Alexander Hamilton once said:

But credit is not only one of the main pillars of the public safety, it is among the principal engines of useful enterprise and internal improvement. As a substitute for capital it is little less useful than gold or silver in agriculture, in commerce, in the manufacturing and mechanic arts.

Again he said:

Credit is an entire thing; every part of it has the nicest sympathy with every other part; wound one limb and the whole tree shrinks and decays.

Secretary of State Charles Evans Hughes, while Governor of New York State, said he opposed the National Government assessing an income tax against State and municipal bonds and urged that to do so—

Would place such limitations on the borrowing power of the State as to make the performance of the functions of local government a matter of Federal grace.

Why, oh, why, should we let a few States control the credit of all other States and the Nation? Why let the National Government control the credit of the States? Why do this when we are to lose so much by the scheme? Why not each control its own credit and the credit of each be left perfect by the other? There is involved here not only a question of State rights, there is involved a question of county rights, of municipal rights, and of individual rights. What doth it profit a nation, State, or individual to make a gain, if by the gaining there is a sacrifice of rights, of privileges, and of life itself, worth infinitely more than is gained? "For what is a man profited if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul—or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?"

Shall we so far forget our duties here as to sell for a mess of pottage the birthright of the people of our Nation, of their children, and of their descendants for all time? May God help us in this and all matters to see the right and to do the right. [Applause.]

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas rose.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move to close debate upon this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] was already on his feet, and the Chair feels constrained to recognize him.

Mr. MONDELL. But the gentleman from Iowa was on his feet also.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will put the question then.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move to close debate upon this paragraph and all amendments thereto.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Oh, the gentleman ought not to include the paragraph.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Then I move to close all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto in five minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and there were—ayes 74, noes 122.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto do now close.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman withhold that for a moment?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming moves that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto do now close.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend that by making debate close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama moves as a substitute—

Mr. MONDELL. I accept that.

Mr. BLACK. Make it 20 minutes.

Mr. HERRICK. I want to ask a question. Is there anything pending?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Alabama that debate close in 10 minutes.

Mr. BLACK. I move to amend the substitute by making it 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the substitute of the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the substitute was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. HUDDLESTON) there were—ayes 94, noes 92.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs upon the motion of the gentleman from Wyoming as amended by the substitute of the gentleman from Alabama.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HUDDLESTON: Page 1, line 9, after "Section 1," strike out the remainder of the section and insert the following: "In the exercise of the power to lay and collect taxes on incomes as granted by Article XVI, Congress shall lay and collect taxes on incomes derived from securities issued by or under the authority of the United States and by or under the authority of any State, Territory, or possession, and on incomes derived from salaries or compensation by all public officers, and on incomes derived from all other sources whatsoever, all without discrimination on account of the source from which derived."

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that. I make the point of order on that on the ground that it is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa makes a point of order against the amendment. The Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, as I understood the amendment, it authorizes the collection of incomes upon other matters than those provided for in the original resolution.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the Chair has any doubt about its not being germane, permit me to say that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama includes not only the subject matter included in the section proper, but it attempts to authorize the levying of a tax by a State, which is included in the next subdivision.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Oh, no.

Mr. STAFFORD. So I understood it. Not only that, but as I heard the reading of it, it permits the levying of a tax on salaries, which is not the proposition before the House at all. This is a measure to levy a tax on incomes derived from bonds, which is quite another proposition.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, clearly the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama is germane. What is the purpose of this resolution? It is to permit the Government in levying taxes to reach incomes that are now escaping taxation. What are those incomes? The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] objects to reaching some salaries that are escaping taxation.

Mr. STAFFORD. The purpose of this resolution is to reach only one character of income, and that is income derived from securities of the National Government and of States and municipalities.

Mr. BLANTON. It ought to be to reach incomes of all kinds, and in my judgment the amendment is in order.

Mr. STAFFORD. The question is not what it ought to be, but what it is.

The CHAIRMAN. The resolution brought in by the Committee on Ways and Means, H. J. Res. 314, deals with State securities, public securities, bonds; while the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] deals with income-tax questions, the salaries of public officials, and other matters, and in the judgment of the Chair it is clearly not germane to the resolution pending.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, will the Chair not hear me for a few minutes? I have offered this amendment and I ought to be heard if the Chair has any doubt about it. The Chair is dealing unfairly with me. I want to say that.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, before the debate is closed, which will be in 10 minutes, I wanted to ask the gentleman from Iowa a question about the nomenclature of this resolution.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman is aware that the time is running.

Mr. SWING. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California is recognized.

Mr. SWING. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment on line 2, page 2, to strike out the last word on line 2, the word "other."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, may the amendment be reported?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

Page 2, line 2, at the end of the line, strike out the word "other."

Mr. SWING. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. SWING. Mr. Chairman, the motions already made to amend this section and the debate on them shows, it seems to me, grave uncertainty as to the meaning and effect of this section. The insertion of the word "other," in line 2, page 2, I believe, only adds to this uncertainty. A mere reading of the section, it seems to me, is sufficient to demonstrate that the word ought to be stricken out.

But, Mr. Chairman, I desire to devote the short time that has been allotted to me to a consideration of the relative merits of this resolution.

I think I appreciate the serious condition which has developed in our country and which has called forth this resolution as a remedy. A large amount of tax-exempt securities have been issued during and since the war, totaling, I believe, nearly $18,000,000,000, and rich men have invested their money to a large extent in these securities and are thereby escaping the payment of taxes that the income tax law says men of that income should pay.

Mr. Chairman, I started out at the beginning of the debate on this matter intending to support this resolution. It had a pleasing sound and seemed like a panacea for many of our present-day ills. We were told that it would greatly increase the revenues of the Government; that it would push over onto the shoulders of the rich who had large incomes more of the burden of Government, lessening proportionately the load on the backs of the laborer, the farmer, and the man of small means; that it would drive capital from its present hiding place in nonproductive securities into investments in the productive securities of industry, with the result that business would flourish and that the country would once again be prosperous and all the people happy. Everybody was said to be for the resolution. The man with a small income advocates it, thinking that here is a chance to catch the rich tax dodger and compel him to contribute his just share toward the support of the Government. And strange to relate these very rich men are also favoring the resolution, believing that it will redound to their benefit. What I want to know is, can both be right; and if so, which will prove to be the bigger gainer? If one must be wrong, which is it more likely to be, the rich man who makes money with money and who employs high-priced experts to advise him, or the laborer and farmer who are not skilled in the intricacies of finance and whose time is largely taken up with earning their daily bread?

Mr. Chairman, while there are arguments in favor of the resolution, it seems to me that we should proceed with considerable caution in destroying a relationship between State and Nation which has existed since the creation of our Government and which had the approval of those master minds who brought this Government into being. The existing inability of the Federal Government to tax State bonds and of the State to tax Federal bonds arises from the dual form of our Government, consisting as it does of sovereign States federated into a Union which is also sovereign. The Supreme Court of the United States early said:

That the great law of self-preservation prevents each in conducting its operations from employing means which would subject the other to the control of another and distinct Government; if the instruments of one can be taxed lightly by the other, they may also be taxed heavily. Their operation may be impeded and may be destroyed if an interference is permitted. Hence the beginning of such taxation is not allowed on the one side, is not claimed on the other.

The argument against giving the Federal Government power to tax State securities was never more forcefully put than by Hon. Charles E. Hughes when Governor of New York. He then said:

But the power to tax incomes should not be granted in such terms as to subject to Federal taxation the incomes derived from bonds issued by the State itself, or those issued by municipal governments organized under the State authority. To place the borrowing capacity of the State and of its governmental agencies at the mercy of the Federal taxing power would be an impairment of the essential rights of the State, which, as its officers, we are bound to defend.

Governor Hughes is no fantastic advocate of any ancient or vague theory of State rights, but a statesman who takes a practical view of the situation. He says further at another point:

To permit such securities to be the subject of Federal taxation is to place such limitations upon the borrowing power of the State as to make the performance of local government a matter of Federal grace.

And he says in conclusion:

While we may desire that the Federal Government may be equipped with all necessary national powers in order that it may perform its national function, we must be equally solicitous to secure the essential bases of State government.

Before making so vital and radical a change in our organic governmental structure it might be well to first determine whether the trouble of which we complain is destined to be permanent or whether it is likely to be temporary and passing. The consequences of the war upset normalcy in many particulars, yet there is hope of most disturbed conditions righting themselves in time. Our Federal Government during the war period issued some $20,000,000,000 worth of securities tax exempt and partly tax exempt. The adverse effect of these issues is passing and, except for the first issue, will soon cease to be a factor in the problem before us. True, the States, counties, districts, and municipalities have shown an unusual activity in issuing bonds since the war, but I believe this to be largely due to the prohibition against public improvements during the war, and that this condition will return to normalcy in the near future.

Let us see what will happen if this resolution is passed. One result will be that before the proposed amendment can be ratified by the necessary number of States every city, county, district, and State will have made it a point to have issued and sold all the bonds for which it can possibly anticipate needs. The subsequent ratification of the amendment after the issuance of these new issues in addition to those already out will be like closing the stable door after the horse has gotten out. The Governments, State and Federal, will have to wait a long time after the adoption of the amendment before it can expect much revenue from that source.

But the contention is made that if this amendment is adopted it will result in forcing capital out of tax-exempt securities and into industrial and productive investment. However, this benefit will not be brought about for 20, 30, or possibly 40 years, because the capital is already very largely invested in these tax-exempt securities, and the very reasons which prompted capital to invest in that class of securities will prompt it to remain there until the securities are paid off. Of course, it must also be self-evident that the only way the money now invested in tax-exempt securities could be taken out of such investment prior to the maturity of the bonds would be for an equal amount of money to be withdrawn from some other field to take its place.

But while it is thus seen that the benefits to be derived are deferred until the next generation it seems certain that disadvantages resulting from the adoption of the amendment will take effect immediately. After the adoption of this amendment the rate of interest borne in future public bond issues must be increased to cover the taxes which may be levied on them, because it is the net return and not the gross which draws money out for investment.

Secretary Mellon, before the Ways and Means Committee, stated that it is probably true that a 3½ per cent tax-free Government bond can be put out at par, and then adds:

Now, to sell a security at par that is not tax free, the Government would have to pay a rate of interest to-day of more than 4 per cent, of course.

He adds—

I suppose it would depend upon the length of time they would have to run, but it would be somewhere from 4½ per cent to perhaps 5 per cent, depending on the length of time they would run.

And Mr. McCoy, the Government actuary, in a memorandum to Secretary Mellon, dated January 24, 1922, and included in the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury, page 321, says:

There is little doubt that under these conditions the future investor in what are now tax-exempt securities would demand that they bear a higher rate of interest or be sold at a discount sufficient, at least, to meet this tax.

It will be found, therefore, that we have not shifted any burden to Wall Street or the capitalists, because they are shrewd enough to pass it back to the people and, in the last analysis, the taxpayer in every community that undertakes public improvement must bear the added burden.

Furthermore, the wording of the present amendment is unfortunate in that it is merely permissive. This uncertainty will operate so that the local taxpayer must in any and all event bear the burden of an increase in rate of interest, whether the Government, State or Federal, gets any benefit in taxing incomes derived from the bonds or not, because the investor in long-term bonds will safeguard himself against every known possible deduction and will insist upon the bonds he buys bearing a rate of interest sufficient to cover all future taxes, both Federal and State, which may possibly be levied. The rate of the future taxes will always be uncertain, and that uncertainty will operate against the people, because the investor will insist that the rate of interest in the bonds he buys be high enough to cover the highest tax that might be levied during the life of the bonds.

Let me briefly suggest some additional objections to this resolution. The amendment, if adopted, will work an unfair discrimination against the West, which has many needed public improvements yet to put through. The East has had 100 years the start in doing its public improvements on tax-exempt money.

It is a move aimed against public ownership of public utilities, and is designed to favor private corporations in this field. How would Los Angeles have fared with its aqueduct and harbor or San Francisco with its Hetch-Hetchy project if their bonds had had to carry an extra 1 to 1½ per cent interest? What will San Diego say with its water supply and harbor improvements yet to be completed? And where will Imperial Valley be when it comes to building the all-American canal if it has to pay this extra interest? The fact is that the strongest propaganda in favor of this resolution has come from those who are fighting public ownership of public utilities.

In this connection, the amendment will operate against the Federal Farm Loan Board in making loans to farmers at low rates of interest. It is no answer to say that 85 per cent of the total mortgages on farms in this country are not under the Federal farm loan act, but are held by private parties. The bankers who make a business of farm loans hate the Government as a competitor, because they know that it was the Federal farm loan act that brought down the general rates of interest in farming sections of the country from 8 and 10 per cent to 6 per cent, which is now the average rate. If you need proof of this, be advised that the Farm Mortgage Bankers' Association of America is unanimously in favor of this proposed constitutional amendment and has been spending large sums of money advocating its adoption. If the Government must pay higher rates for its money it must charge the farmers higher rates, and when the Government raises its rates, then these bankers can raise their rates also.

It will immediately operate as a gift of a billion or more of dollars to present holders of tax-exempt securities, because if the future issues of this class of bonds is prohibited the present outstanding tax-free bonds will advance greatly in value.

It is proposed that the Federal Government will let the States tax Federal bonds in exchange for the States allowing the Federal Government to tax State bonds, but the exchange is an unfair one to the States. The National Government, after the adoption of this amendment, will probably not issue any more bonds in large quantities for a good many more years to come. The States, counties, and municipalities will continue issuing bonds, the income from which the Federal Government can tax without the States being able to collect a tax in anything like a proportionate amount on Federal bonds. Few States have an income tax law. Counties, districts, and cities probably can never have an income tax law, and must bear the disadvantage of having their bonds taxed by the Federal Government without any corresponding benefit to them.

The majority of the bonds of this country are located in New York, Chicago, and the other big cities of the East, and the States in which these bonds are domiciled will get whatever benefits there are from taxing these bonds. California, I fear, will gain proportionately little.

There has been only one argument advanced in favor of this resolution which has seriously worried me, and that is that the present tax-exempt securities are furnishing an avenue of escape for those of very large incomes from their just share of the burdens of our Government. I strongly believe in the graduated income tax. It is the most just tax that the mind of man has yet devised; and if I thought for one minute that the only way to prevent that tax from being undermined and overthrown was to adopt this resolution, I would vote it notwithstanding the many objections which I feel can properly be urged against it.

However, such a radical change is not necessary to effect a cure of the present conditions of which we complain. If we sincerely desire to stop the gap through which the rich tax dodger is now escaping without throwing an unnecessary additional burden upon the taxpayers of progressive communities, this can easily be done by adopting a middle course which will remedy the evil without creating a worse ill.

In a general way, the recent issues of Federal bonds have been made tax-exempt on incomes up to $100,000 per year. My suggestion is to embody this idea in this proposed constitutional amendment, so that it will then read:

SECTION 1. The United States shall have power to lay and collect taxes on income derived from securities issued, after the ratification of this article, by or under the authority of any State, when such securities are owned by any individual, estate, partnership, or corporation whose ownership of tax-exempt securities, Federal or State, exceeds $100,000 in amount, according to the par face value of such securities, but without discrimination against income derived from such securities and in favor of income derived from securities issued, after the ratification of this article, by or under the authority of the United States or any other State.

In my opinion, the resolution so worded will leave an ample market for all future issue of public securities at a price which will not necessitate any increase in their rates of interest, and at the same time do the thing so many on this floor have said ought to be done—stop the loophole through which the very rich of the country are now escaping from the necessity of paying their just and proper share of the expenses of this Government.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask recognition on an amendment that I have sent to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is first on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. SWING].

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Five minutes remain for debate. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I understand that this reciprocal tax provision that we have here applies on the one hand to securities issued by the States and political subdivisions of the States, and on the other hand to securities issued by the United States. That is the general purpose. Now, I find that at both ends it is provided that in addition there shall be subject to the reciprocal taxing power securities issued under authority of the States and securities issued under authority of the Federal Government. I wish to ask this question: Take, for instance, the securities issued under the authority of the Federal Government. Is it intended that if this amendment is adopted we shall involve Philippine bonds issued by the authority of the Federal Government? Are there to be included the securities that are issued in the interest of the farming classes, the land-bank bonds, and so forth, and the prospective issues of similar securities if legislation now in progress of passage should be enacted, and also are there to be included issues of railroad bonds following the adoption of the amendment?

The Esch-Cummins law, I believe, forbids the future issue of railroad bonds except under the authority of the Government. Is it the purpose of the gentleman to make this amendment as broad as the suggestion that I have offered would seem to contemplate?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If I correctly understand the gentleman, it is the purpose to include all securities that are issued by or under the authority of any act of Congress.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Then the States would be unable to impose a higher income tax upon hereafter-issued railroad bonds than on the bonds issued by the United States itself, and at the same time the States would be permitted to attach an income tax to farm securities. That is the purpose, is it?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I do not understand the gentleman at all.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I have tried to make it as plain as possible. As I understand, the design of the proposed amendment is not only to restrict the reciprocal provision very carefully to securities that are issued by the States and the subdivisions of the States on the one hand and by the United States on the other hand but has gone far beyond that field and has included a large number and a great variety of other securities. He does that by the use of the words "under authority."

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman forgets that it is only discrimination in favor of the United States securities on the one hand or in favor of the State securities on the other hand.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Yes; but it goes beyond that. It does not stop with the State securities and the United States securities, but takes in this great range of securities that are issued under the authority of the different sovereignties.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman is contemplating some matter that I do not fully understand. I do not think the amendment has that effect.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. SWING].

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. OLIVER: Page 1, line 12, after the word "State," insert "when such securities are owned by any individual, partnership, or corporation, whose ownership of tax-exempt securities, Federal or State, exceeds $100,000 in amount according to the par face value of such securities."

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Chairman, may I ask—

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is closed.

Mr. OLIVER. May I ask that the section be read as proposed to be amended?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the section as proposed to be amended will be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

SECTION 1. The United States shall have power to lay and collect taxes on income derived from securities issued, after the ratification of this article, by or under the authority of any State, when such securities are owned by any individual, partnership, or corporation, whose ownership of tax-exempt securities, Federal or State, exceeds $100,000 in amount according to the par face value of such securities, but without discrimination against income derived from such securities and in favor of income derived from securities issued, after the ratification of this article, by or under the authority of the United States or any other State.

Mr. ROSENBLUM. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment to the amendment to insert after the word "individual" the word "estate."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia offers an amendment to the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ROSENBLUM to the amendment of Mr. OLIVER: After the word "individual" insert the word "estate," so that as amended it will read: "Page 1, line 12, after the word 'State,' insert 'when such securities are owned by any individual, estate, partnership, or corporation whose ownership of tax-exempt securities, Federal or State, exceeds $100,000 in amount according to the par face value of such securities.'"

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. ROSENBLUM].

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs upon the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER].

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee: Page 1, line 9, after the word "the" strike out "United States" and insert "Congress."

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That makes it conform to the rest of the language of the Constitution.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. MOORES of Indiana: Page 1, line 7, after the word "by," strike out the words "the legislatures of" and insert "convention duly called by authority of law in."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That is subject to debate, I believe.

The CHAIRMAN. No; the debate has been closed on section 1. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee) there were 60 ayes and 91 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment as a separate section, section 1 (a).

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. LONDON: Insert a new section, section 1 (a): "This section shall go into effect in 1945."

Mr. LONDON. I offer this amendment for the purpose of obtaining the floor.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, under the rule this is an amendment to section 1, and all debate has been closed on section 1.

The CHAIRMAN. This is a new section.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. But it says "this section."

Mr. LONDON. It should read "the above section" shall go into effect in the year 1945.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Debate is closed on the first section, which this is an amendment to.

Mr. LONDON. I offer it as a new section, to read section 1 (a), and I modify my amendment so it shall read "This article shall go into effect in the year 1945."

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, that the rule as to a new section requires that it must be offered as an amendment to something, and this is offered as an amendment to the preceding section. I think the Chair will find that there are authorities on that subject. The gentleman surely has got to offer it as an amendment to something, and if it was not offered as an amendment to something you can not tell whether it was germane to the subject, and it could go on forever.

The CHAIRMAN. The later decisions hold that this is debatable. The earlier decisions held it was not. The Chair holds that the question is debatable, and the gentleman from New York has a right to discuss it for five minutes.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment for the purpose of presenting my views on the merits of the proposition. I am going to vote against the proposed constitutional amendment. [Applause.] I do not believe in demagoguery; I believe in teaching the people, not in deceiving them. When the gentleman from New York [Mr. MILLS], the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY]—when Mr. Mellon announces that they are the friends of the people, I feel like examining their pockets to see if they do not contain burglar's tools. [Laughter and applause.] I have no confidence in propositions that are proclaimed to be for the benefit of the people by the leaders of the Republican Party. I want to say to the Republicans who come from the progressive West, let them look out when they vote for this amendment. It will come to plague them. The reciprocity provision is a fraud and a deceit, as was so clearly shown by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] when he dissected the bill. It gives the power to the Federal Government to destroy every municipality, to destroy every State. So far as some Members of Congress from the State of New York are concerned, it means transferring to the floor of Congress a fight which has been going on in the State of New York between the great empire city of New York and the plutocrats who want to prevent the municipalization of the rapid-transit system. It is a blow at the great city of New York.

I want to warn you as a Socialist, who is interested in the development of public ownership, against the concentration of governmental power in the city of Washington. I want to warn you as a Social Democrat against the danger. What has saved the United States from revolutionary upheavals is the distribution of governmental responsibility among 48 State governments and among numerous municipalities. If municipal ownership is practical, let the municipality be free to try it. It is by the cooperation of free units from the bottom up that democracy may expand.

Whatever the pretensions of the advocates of this measure may be, there is only one object behind the proposed amendment, and that is to prevent municipalities and States from utilizing their respective resources for public undertakings.

With this a part of the Constitution, a reactionary Congress would have taxed out of existence the bonds of North Dakota when that State challenged the rule of the financial oligarchy. I warn you against conferring upon the Congress this extraordinary power. Whenever a municipality, whenever a State, shall attempt to extend its public activities the representatives of lumber here, the representatives of the banks and of the various protected interests here will strangle it by destroying its bonds and credit. The proposed amendment should be defeated. [Applause.]

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto do now close.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the section offered by the gentleman from New York.

The section was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. Each State shall have power to lay and collect taxes on income derived by its residents from securities issued, after the ratification of this article, by or under the authority of the United States; but without discrimination against income derived from such securities and in favor of income derived from securities issued, after the ratification of this article, by or under the authority of such State.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment for the purpose of emphasizing the fact that there are only four States of the American Union that are now in a position to take advantage of the provisions of this resolution if it should become a part of the Constitution of the United States. Many of the States would have to enact income-tax laws which now have no income-tax laws, and other States would have to amend their constitutions in order to permit their legislatures to tax the income derived from governmental securities.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. This provision gives the State power to levy taxes, and the Constitution of the United States of course supersedes a State constitution.

Mr. HUSTED. Of course it does; there is no question about that; but that does not affect the question in the slightest degree. There are States that have no income-tax laws. My point is this, that any Member of Congress here who lives in a State which has not an income-tax law is practically imposing upon his State an income-tax law, because if the State does not enact an income-tax law it can not take advantage of the provisions of this proposed amendment. It does not affect my own State of New York, because we have a State income-tax law, and under that law we can tax Government securities; but in the State of New Jersey there is a provision in the constitution that the legislature of the State can not tax such securities; and there are many States of this Union which have no income-tax laws and do not want any income-tax laws, and yet you will be imposing an income-tax law upon them, because they will have to enact an income-tax law in self-defense. If they do not enact an income-tax law, the Federal Government will be able to tax the income from securities of the State; but the State in its turn will not be able to tax the income derived from the securities of the Federal Government; and you gentlemen know, who come from States where they have no income-tax laws, whether you want to assume the responsibility of imposing upon your States income-tax laws against their will.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move to close debate upon this section and all amendments thereto.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto do now close.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a preferential motion. I move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York that the committee do now rise.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LONDON) there were—ayes 52, noes 117.

So the committee refused to rise.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the motion of the gentleman from Iowa that debate close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Wyoming, as an amendment to the motion of the gentleman from Iowa, that debate close in 10 minutes on this section and all amendments thereto.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move as a substitute to amend that by providing that debate close in half an hour. There are a great many here who want to say something, and I do not know of any measure that has been before Congress that is of such vital importance as this one of submitting a constitutional amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute of the gentleman from Pennsylvania that debate close in half an hour.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania) there were—ayes 66, noes 101.

So the substitute was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment of the gentleman from Wyoming that debate close in 10 minutes.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SWING) there were—ayes 49, noes 107.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs upon the motion of the gentleman from Iowa that all debate upon the section and all amendments thereto do now close.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the Husted amendment.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. TUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TUCKER: Amend by adding at the end of section 2 the following:

"Provided, That the revenue derived from any income tax that may be levied by the Congress of the United States under this amendment shall be applied to the payment of the public debt of the United States and for no other purpose."

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the amendment is germane, and overrules point of order. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. GREEN of Iowa: Page 2, line 4, strike out "Sec." and insert in lieu thereof "Section."

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. That is to make it conform with the first section.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to. Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. GREEN of Iowa: Page 2, line 7, after the word "States," strike out the semicolon and insert a comma.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. That is to make it conform with the first section.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Virginia rise?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. To offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. MOORE of Virginia: Add a new section, as follows—

The CHAIRMAN. This is a new section and it is not in order at the present time.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the section insert "or any other State."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LANKFORD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LANKFORD: Page 2, line 8, after the word "securities," insert the words "or against income derived from securities issued under authority of any other State."

Mr. LANKFORD. I ask unanimous consent that the section be read as amended.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. HERRICK and Mr. RICKETTS. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move to close all debate on the resolution and all amendments thereto.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that it is not in order.

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to add a new section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that the motion is not in order.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the committee can at all times control the time for debate. True, before the committee rises, and I will ask the attention of the parliamentary clerk, we can not forbid the offering of amendments. That is always the privilege of any Member on the floor, but we can limit debate.

Mr. BLANTON. Not in committee.

Mr. STAFFORD. We can limit debate on the resolution. The committee has read the resolution, every section of it. Now, a motion is made to close debate on the resolution. That does not foreclose the offering of germane amendments as independent sections or as perfecting amendments to the section, but it is within the power of the committee to close debate, otherwise we might be for all time offering new sections.

Mr. DOWELL. Debate is already closed.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, of course the committee can close debate on each paragraph as it is read. The committee can not close debate on the entire bill. The committee can rise whenever it gets ready, but the committee can not close debate on the entire bill so long as the committee remains in session.

Mr. MONDELL. The committee can not rise while amendments are being offered.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. No; if there is an amendment offered as a new section the committee can not close debate until it has been debated at least five minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. The committee can close debate on the resolution and all amendments to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the motion of the gentleman from Iowa is not now in order. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KETCHAM].

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment as a new section.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the previous section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JONES of Texas: Page 2, line 10, after the word "State," insert the following proviso: "Provided, This article shall not apply to or affect income derived from securities issued under the provisions of the Federal farm loan act or any amendments thereto."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment proposing an additional section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair had recognized the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KETCHAM] to offer an amendment.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the resolution back to the House with the amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the resolution as amended do pass.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that is out of order while amendments are pending and being offered.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that, if there is any gentleman who desires to offer an amendment as a new section, the motion is not now in order. There is a distinct ruling on that, made by the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. Sherley, many years ago, in which he held that such a motion was in order, and the next day, after an examination of the precedents, he rose and stated that his ruling was wrong; and since that time the statement made by the gentleman from Kentucky on the succeeding day has been followed continuously. So long as there is an amendment to be proposed by way of a new section, a motion to rise is not in order.

Mr. LONGWORTH. If that were true, how is it possible for the Chair to know in advance whether any gentleman desires to offer an amendment or not? It is for the House to decide and vote down the motion to rise in case it thinks there are some amendments to be offered. The motion of the gentleman from Iowa is certainly in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair had recognized the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KETCHAM] to offer a new section.

Mr. LONGWORTH. If the gentleman from Michigan had been recognized, that is a different thing. But after the submission of the motion of the gentleman from Michigan it is undoubtedly in order for the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] to move that the committee rise and report the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan offers an amendment by way of a new section, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KETCHAM: Add a new section to the resolution, to be known as section 3, to read as follows:

"Nothing contained in this amendment shall be construed to refer to securities or bonds issued under the terms of the act known as the Federal farm loan act."

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move to close all debate.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. It is that this matter has already been disposed of by the action of the committee on the motion made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] in a proviso, which was voted down. This is in effect the same motion as that made by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, may I say that at the same time I was on my feet asking for recognition? It seems hardly fair that one should be taken off his feet by a purely parliamentary situation.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, this is not a new section. It is really an amendment to the preceding section, and, being an amendment to the preceding section, you can not evade the order of the committee by calling it a new section and trying to get recognition under that guise.

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, will the Chair hear me?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. KETCHAM. I think at the same time, or probably previous to the time the Chair recognized the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES], I had been recognized to present this very matter.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TILSON. Is this a new section or not?

The CHAIRMAN. It is offered as a new section.

Mr. TILSON. In the face of the ruling made a moment ago, I make the point of order that the debate has closed, and therefore I object to the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan on that ground. I wish to cite some precedents.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin also made a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. I did, on the ground that it was really an amendment to the preceding section and in violation of the order of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin has made the same point of order.

Mr. TILSON. I withdraw my point of order.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I made the first point of order that this matter was already disposed of by the action of the committee on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES].

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order made by the gentleman from Connecticut is the same as that made by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CRISP. If an amendment to a section is offered and is rejected by the House, is it then in order to offer in substance that same proposition under the form of a new section?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KETCHAM] as a new section in substance is similar to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES], but in form it is not the same. It has been held by occupants of the Chair, including the late Mr. Speaker Clark, that a verbal change sometimes will make an amendment in order, although similar to an amendment ruled out of order. Mr. Speaker Clark on one occasion ruled that the change of one word in the language of a second amendment caused a deviation making that second amendment in order. Therefore the Chair will overrule the point of order and recognize the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KETCHAM].

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move that the debate on this section close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa moves that the debate on this section close in five minutes.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there has been no debate on the amendment, and that motion can not be made until after five minutes of debate.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that you can not even move to close debate until there has been some debate on the amendment. After debate has been had, then the motion can be made.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order of the gentleman from New York and recognizes the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee—

Mr. TILSON. Now, Mr. Chairman, I renew my parliamentary inquiry. Is this offered as a new section?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. Then, Mr. Chairman, I wish to raise the point of order that debate has been closed and that no debate on the new section now offered is in order.

Mr. SWING. I make the point of order against the gentleman's point of order that debate has already been begun by the gentleman from Michigan.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KETCHAM].

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, I am not an expert on financial matters, but I know something about the burden that rests upon the millions of farmers in the United States who have mortgages on their farms and the residents of cities and villages who have mortgages on their homes. In the interest of farm ownership and in the interest of home ownership I claim the attention of the committee for a few minutes while I ask your careful consideration of the amendment that I have introduced.

There are in the United States 1,461,306 farms that have upon them the burden of mortgages totaling the sum of $4,000,000,000. Three out of every eight farms in the whole country operated by their owners are carrying the burden of mortgage indebtedness. The total number of such farms is 1,461,306 and the total mortgage burden $4,000,000,000, in round numbers. In that great group of States classified by the Bureau of the Census as East and West North Central States and including Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Iowa, Missouri, North and South Dakota, Nebraska, and Kansas there are such mortgaged farms to the number of 694,000 out of a total of 1,477,000, or 47 per cent as an average. The high point is reached in North Dakota, where the percentage of owner-operated mortgaged farms is 71 per cent of the total of such farms, while in Ohio the low point of the group is reached with 28½ per cent. The total burden of mortgage on owner-operated farms in the North Central group of States is $2,360,000,000, or 59 per cent of the total for the country. Speaking particularly to the Representatives from the North Central group, may I call your attention to the practical effect of this resolution without my amendment. It will without question raise the interest rate on farm-loan bonds, and so both directly on the 15 per cent of farm loans now made by the Federal farm loan banks and indirectly in the raising of the competitive rates on the 85 per cent of farm loans made through other channels will the practical effects of this resolution show. Estimates vary as to the amount of this increase. Some say it will not exceed one-half per cent, others say 1 per cent, and high authority says it will reach 1½ per cent.

If you vote for this resolution without my amendment you will be compelled to say in effect to your farmer constituents, "While there is a great and acknowledged evil in connection with tax-exempt securities, yet, gentlemen, I so far forgot your interests in this matter that I allowed myself to vote for an increase of from one-half to one and possibly one and one-half per cent in your mortgage interest rates."

Upon the assumption that the increases in mortgage interest rates will be as above indicated, I am sure the committee and my colleagues from the North Central States will be interested in noting just how much in increased interest this resolution will require the farmers to pay. If the increase is one-half per cent, the amount of additional interest required from the farmers of the whole country will be $20,000,000 yearly, and from those of the north central group of States $11,800,000. If the increase should be 1 per cent, the amount of interest added to the farm mortgages of the country would be $40,000,000, and to the north central group, $23,600,000. If the increase should be 1½ per cent, the respective amounts would be $60,000,000 and $35,400,000.

My friends, your farmer folks are very practical fellows, and while they will not go into the intricacies of this very fine and learned financial discussion, I am here to tell you that they know the difference between one-half of 1 per cent and 1 per cent, and possibly 1½ per cent increase in their interest rate, and if you go back and say to them that under the guise and lure of punishing the rich you allowed yourselves to vote for this proposition, in my opinion you will make a serious mistake, and I want to bring the seriousness of this thought home to you. [Applause.]

A few moments ago, Mr. Chairman, I referred to home ownership whether in country or city as a matter of vital concern. Forty per cent of the owned homes of the country are mortgaged and these too will feel the added burden which a lessening of the competition in mortgage rates will impose. Just how important this is to those Members whose constituencies are found in cities above 100,000 is shown by a few illustrations: Akron, Ohio, has 12,376 mortgaged homes and 6,703 free from debt. Boston, 19,609 mortgaged and 9,998 free. Chicago, 102,719 mortgaged and 58,382 free. Detroit, 49,509 mortgaged and 31,506 free. Grand Rapids, 8,239 mortgaged and 7,655 free. Milwaukee, 22,031 mortgaged and 14,994 free. New York, 123,865 mortgaged and 33,358 free. Philadelphia, 107,974 mortgaged and 45,802 free. Seattle, 18,010 mortgaged and 17,543 free. Springfield, Mass., 6,442 mortgaged and 1,907 free.

In the matter of homes owned, Des Moines leads the country with a percentage of 51.1, with Grand Rapids, Mich., second, percentage 50.2, while New York City draws the cellar championship with 12.7 per cent. It seems very clear to me, Mr. Chairman, that both farm and home ownership will be adversely affected by this resolution unless amended as I propose.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KETCHAM. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. If this becomes effective it will relate only to the future, and there will be no tax on the income of bonds already issued.

Mr. KETCHAM. My colleague has lost sight of the fact that the direct effect is not so great as the indirect effect. And he well knows, because of his long and valuable experience on the Committee on Agriculture, when the Federal farm loan act was first proposed interest rates on ordinary farm mortgages ran as high in some sections of the country as 8, 10, and 12 per cent, and he also knows that upon the enactment of the Federal farm loan act the interest rate went down so that the average interest rate on farm mortgages now is 6 per cent. He knows that that reduction in the interest rate was an indirect effect of the passage of the farm loan act, because 85 per cent of the total mortgages on farms in this country are not under the farm loan act but they are held in the general run of business as between farmer and banker.

Speaking on this same subject a few days ago, I said:

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, my amendment proposes to exempt from the provisions of the constitutional amendment the bonds or securities issued under the terms of the Federal farm loan act. The total amount of Federal farm-loan bonds sold to November 30, 1922, is $641,208,375. If the total of tax-exempt securities issued amounts to $16,000,000,000, then the amount of such total affected by my amendment is approximately 4 per cent. I am aware that there should be unusual merit in any proposition that seeks to modify the application of a proposed amendment to the Constitution. In support of my amendment, therefore, I present the following considerations:

1. The Federal farm-loan system has clearly established itself as a sound, practical, and indispensable credit agency for American agriculture. Its operations have been interrupted by hostile interests through court procedure and limited by the natural hesitancy our people manifest in adopting a new plan in so vital a matter as mortgage loans. Its present popularity is shown by the fact that during the period from November 1, 1921, to November 1, 1922, the Federal land banks loaned $219,780,649 to 70,993 farmers and sold Federal farm-loan bonds to investors to the amount of $278,150,000. The Treasury holdings of these bonds have been reduced $69,650,000, and Secretary Mellon says that—

"The system is rapidly approaching a condition which meets the original intention that it should be a mutual organization operated under Government supervision and control with the capital stock supplied by the borrowing farmers and not by the Government."

Until such time shall come it appears clear to me that no action should be contemplated by this committee that will seriously limit, if not entirely suspend, the operations of the Federal farm-loan system by advancing the interest rates.

Showing that my proposed amendment has very substantial backing, Mr. Chairman, I further quote from my remarks on December 20:

Probably no farm conference in the history of the United States has created so much interest as the one held not quite one year ago here in Washington, and I now quote from the committee on taxation in the report of the National Agricultural Conference, page 141. I quote the second recommendation, which, by the way, was adopted unanimously by more than 400 delegates from various agricultural activities attending this conference:

"We recommend—

"Second, a constitutional amendment prohibiting issuance of tax-free securities: Provided, That inasmuch as agricultural lands and mortgages are both taxed and that agriculture is a fundamental industry upon which all industries depend, nothing in these resolutions shall apply to bonds, debentures, and certificates of indebtedness issued under authority of the Federal farm loan act or any amendments thereto."

My amendment to the resolution will give point to this recommendation unanimously adopted by this great gathering of farmers uniting in one of the best expressions of farm opinion that we have ever had in this country.

Believing, Mr. Chairman, that the confidence the farmers of the country have shown in the Federal farm-loan system as indicated by its growth since recent court restrictions have been removed, is most wholesome and guarantees a promising future for it. I present my amendment in the hope that the committee will adopt it and thus insure the continuance of its most beneficent work. Undoubtedly we have gone to extremes in issuing tax-exempt bonds, but in our desire to remedy this difficulty we should not impose heavier burdens on an already overburdened agriculture, and in all this discussion I do not want you to lose sight of the fact that the great proposition here, so far as farmers are concerned, is whether you want to increase the interest rate on farm mortgages. Do not forget that when you vote on my amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that all debate has been closed. While amendments may be offered indefinitely, either as simple amendments or in the form of a new section or paragraph, they can not be debated after debate upon the pending section, or paragraph, as the case may be, has been closed. I think that a few moments ago the Chair, by inadvertence, or without having the precedents at hand, rendered a decision that if allowed to go unchallenged will prove to be detrimental to the orderly procedure of this House. If the Chair will hear me, I should like to have just a few moments to call the attention of the Chair to some authorities on this subject.

My position is, Mr. Chairman, that an amendment offered as a new section is, for parliamentary purposes, an amendment to the preceding section. Debate having been closed on the preceding section debate is closed on any amendment that may be thereafter offered, whether it be offered in the form of a new section or otherwise. I would refer the Chair to a decision rendered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Good].

On July 19, 1919, the prohibition enforcement bill was under consideration in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. On motion of the chairman of the committee in charge of the bill all debate on section 7 and all amendments thereto had been closed in 15 minutes. Under this motion all debate was exhausted, and the gentleman from Washington [Mr. MILLER] offered an amendment. He attempted to debate his amendment when the point of order was made, and after being debated Chairman Good ruled as follows:

The Chair will state the parliamentary situation. Time has been fixed for the debate on section 7 limited to 15 minutes. That time has expired.

The Chairman then made reference to an earlier ruling to the same effect. He then continues his ruling as follows:

Any amendment in the nature of a new section, under the former ruling of the Chair, has been held to be an amendment to that section, and therefore all debate on section 7 has been exhausted. The gentleman from Washington will be permitted to have his amendment put as an amendment, but it is still an amendment to section 7, and the debate on section 7 has been concluded.

Again on the same day, when section 26 of the prohibition enforcement bill had been reached and debated, on motion of Mr. VOLSTEAD all debate on the section and all amendments thereto had been closed, Mr. Saunders, of Virginia, offered an amendment as a separate section, and proceeded to debate, when the Chair advised him that debate had been closed. The Chairman [Mr. Good] said:

Debate has been closed on section 26, and the Chair has already held in a previous ruling that an amendment offered as a new section was an amendment to the previous section, and where debate has been exhausted upon that section debate was also exhausted on the amendment offered as a new section.

On September 12, 1919, the Sweet bill was under consideration, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] being in the chair, when a similar question arose, and, upon a parliamentary inquiry as to whether closing debate on the section would preclude the offering of a new section, the Chairman said:

The Chair holds that it would not, but the amendment would not be subject to debate if the motion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET] should prevail.

On May 6, 1921, the Army appropriation bill being under consideration, I was in the chair when the same question arose in almost exactly the same form as in the cases already referred to. I then cited the decisions of the gentleman from Iowa and the gentleman from Kansas, and ruled the same way as they had ruled.

On May 10, 1921, the Army bill being still under consideration, I was still in the chair when the question again arose, and I made exactly the same ruling. I have made such examination of the authorities as I have been able to make during the time I have had since the question first arose this afternoon, and I have not been able to find a single contrary decision. I was informed that there was a different ruling made by the distinguished gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON], but upon investigation I find that the question was not submitted to him for a ruling, and that he only expressed an opinion as to what he thought would be the proper ruling should the question be presented for decision. I contend that this line of decisions, although not long, should be followed. The rule established by them is founded upon sound principles. If it should be established otherwise, there might never be an end to debate, and the committee would find itself powerless if anyone inclined to obstructive tactics should see fit to offer one new section or paragraph after another and claim the right to debate each as an amendment. I think that the chairman will make a mistake, so far as the rules and the orderly procedure of the House are concerned, if he does not in this case sustain the point of order.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Is it not possible that at the end of a bill an amendment might be offered which would not be germane to the preceding section?

Mr. TILSON. I can not conceive that there would be any case that might arise wherein it ought to be allowed that an indefinite number of amendments should be allowed to be offered and debated. Therefore I insist that for parliamentary purposes every amendment should be considered as an amendment to the preceding section.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I want to call attention to a precedent. The gentleman from Connecticut will remember that when the war resolution was being adopted this very question arose and the Chair then held that he would entertain the new amendment offered as a new section until it developed to his satisfaction that they were frivolous, and for the purpose of killing time, and whenever that point was reached he would shut it off and not until then.

Mr. TILSON. I was not referring to amendments but only referring to debate on amendments.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I make this suggestion in connection with the argument of the gentleman from Connecticut that an amendment may be offered as a new section at the end of a resolution or bill which is not germane to the previous section but is germane to the general purposes of the bill. Therefore a motion to close debate on the previous section would not logically apply to a new section which might not be germane to the previous section but was germane to the general purposes of the bill.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, if I caught correctly the precedents cited by the gentleman from Connecticut they were on matters that were offered in the body of the bill.

Mr. TILSON. It does not appear whether they were or not.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. And not at the end of the bill.

Mr. TILSON. It does not appear whether they were in the middle or at the end of the bill; it simply refers to the preceding section.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It seems to me that there would be a difference; in fact, there ought to be a difference, in practice as regards a paragraph that might be offered in the midst of a bill, and, by the by, I think the precedents cited were all on appropriation bills and not upon legislative bills. Of course, I realize that there has to be some reasonable and decent limitation about these matters; but it does seem to me that upon a legislative bill or resolution such as this, that if a section be offered at the end of the bill as a new section there ought to be an opportunity for debate until such time as the committee gets ready to close debate, which it can do at the end of five minutes.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. As to a part of the question submitted by the gentleman from Tennessee, whether these decisions were all on appropriation bills, I desire to state that two of the decisions—the two rendered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Good]—were on the prohibition enforcement bill, then in charge of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD].

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. HICKS. From a parliamentary standpoint, is not a new section in effect an amendment to the preceding section?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. No; it is not, particularly when it is at the end of the bill, unless it shows on its face that it is.

Mr. HICKS. But from a parliamentary standpoint a new section is the same thing as an amendment.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do not think so.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I made my point of order simply to maintain the rights of the House and because of my sincere interest in the proper interpretation of our rules and the orderly procedure of the House. I did not make it for the purpose of blocking or obstructing proceedings. If it will facilitate matters, as seems to be the present impression, I am quite willing to withdraw temporarily the point of order, and I now do so.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate upon the pending amendment and all amendments thereto do now close.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan by adding, after the words "Federal farm loan," the words "and joint-stock land banks."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HUDSPETH to the amendment offered by Mr. KETCHAM: At the end of the amendment after the word "Act," insert the words "and Federal joint stock land banks."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HUDSPETH) there were—ayes 57, noes 102.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that it be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the amendment be again reported. Is there objection?

Mr. SNYDER. I object.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I am informed that the amendment never has been reported from the desk.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Oh, yes; it has.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. KETCHAM) there were—ayes 70, noes 102.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise and report the joint resolution back to the House with amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the joint resolution as amended do pass.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Some 15 minutes ago the Chair looking at me recognized me to present an amendment which I stated was an additional section to the resolution. The Chair, however, in a few minutes said that it was not in order at that time for the reason that an amendment was being proposed to the second section. The Chair knows that I was desirous of offering the amendment which is now on the Clerk's desk. I think under the ruling made awhile ago by the Chair, and the parliamentary law that seems to be admitted by everyone here, I am entitled to have the amendment read and voted upon.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, there is no question whatever that before the motion to rise and report the resolution can be considered any gentleman offering an amendment has the right to have it submitted. I was the Member who offered the amendment in the Committee of the Whole when Mr. Shirley was chairman, and disallowed my offering it, when a motion was made to rise and report the bill. Mr. Shirley shortly afterwards admitted that he was in error, because all the precedents are the other way.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. There are two or three amendments that I desire to offer. Of course, I do not claim the right to debate any of them.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has the right to offer his amendment before the Chair puts the question to rise.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I have sent to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. MOORE of Virginia: Add a section as follows: "Sec. 3. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution, as provided in the Constitution, within five years from the date of the submission thereof to the States by Congress."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment as a new section, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. MOORE of Virginia: Add a section as follows: "Sec. 3. The term 'without discrimination' shall be construed to require as far as possible equality and uniformity in the rates of taxation."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, adding a new section.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I think it is quite obvious that we can not go on doing this forever. I insist upon my motion to rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will first report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. MOORE of Virginia: Add a section as follows: "Sec. 3. This amendment shall not be construed to permit legislation intended to curtail or regulate in any manner whatever the power of any State over the issue of securities, or that will have that effect."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will now put the motion of the gentleman from Iowa, that the committee do now rise and report the joint resolution back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the joint resolution as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. McARTHUR, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration House Joint Resolution 314, proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the joint resolution, as amended, do pass.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the joint resolution and all amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment; if not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time; was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. MCARTHUR. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order it is an automatic roll call provided for by the Constitution.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 223, nays 101, answered "present" 3, not voting 101, as follows:

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Is it in order to move to reconsider and lay that motion on the table?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so.

On motion of Mr. GREEN of Iowa, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. GERNERD, Mr. HILL, Mr. KNUTSON, Mr. DALE, Mr. LANKFORD, Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska, Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee, Mr. RAKER, Mr. OLIVER, and Mr. LONDON were granted leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD on this resolution.

The extension of remarks referred to is here printed in full as follows:

Mr. GERNERD. Mr. Speaker, the one great problem which has always confronted the leading minds of the Government has been that of taxation. It has played a dominant part ever since governments have been organized. Up to 1909 the revenues of the Federal Government were raised entirely through duties upon foreign imports and taxes upon tobacco and spirituous liquors, but with the great expansion of our Government the revenues from these sources became inadequate and a new source of income had to be provided. This resulted in the adoption of a direct income tax, which was made possible through the adoption of the sixteenth amendment to the Constitution. By the imposition of a nominal percentage upon the net incomes of corporations and individuals in excess of $5,000 a sufficient sum was raised, together with those amounts realized from accustomed sources, to meet the increased operating expenses of the Government.

With the advent of the World War the question of raising revenues through taxation presented a most difficult and perplexing problem. Billions of dollars were immediately required and every conceivable plan was thought of by Congress to raise the colossal sums of money that were needed to finance our part of the war. This great emergency brought about the adoption of a graduated income tax with its surtaxes and excess-profits taxes as added features for the collection of large sums of moneys from those who were abnormally profiting through the war. Naturally it was not possible to raise all of the moneys which were immediately needed to conduct the war through taxation, so the Government issued $23,250,000,000 worth of securities, which were sold to the American people.

More than $10,000,000,000 of this total were issued exempt from all taxation as an inducement for their speedy sale. At the time this was thought a justifiable policy. But with the advent of peace it was thought that all war-time taxation would be repealed and that there would be a return to a normal income tax. Subsequent events, however, have dissipated this idea, for it was soon realized that a very strong sentiment prevailed that war-time taxes should be continued, so that Government revenues might be enriched by those making what many regarded as excessive profits. After a long and vigorous struggle, Congress finally passed a new revenue bill which proved a partial compromise, so that to-day we still retain some of the war-time features, to wit, a maximum surtax of 50 per cent and a nominal tax of 8 per cent upon net incomes above $2,500.

The practical operation of the present revenue bill, with its high surtaxes, has clearly revealed its inherent weaknesses, for it has encouraged men of wealth to buy tax-free securities, thereby affording them an escape from bearing their just burdens of taxation. The result has been that the revenues realized through the imposition of the surtaxes have shrunk so greatly that billions of dollars have been drawn out of productive industry and invested in tax-free securities. The question this extraordinary situation presents is whether or not the stability and the prosperity of the Nation can long endure if we permit the great wealth of the Nation to continue to flow into channels from which this gigantic capital is secure from taxation. It is estimated that about thirty billions of the Nation's wealth is so invested and that this amount is annually increased by more than a billion dollars. It is safe to assume that there is very little danger of the Federal Government in the future issuing any more tax-exempt securities and that it will retire those that are now outstanding as rapidly as it can by law; but the great menace rests with the States, cities, and minor units of government that are at present issuing excessively these securities. They have increased their indebtedness in the last 10 years from $4,500,000,000 to approximately nine billions at the close of 1922. It is only by a realization of these stupendous figures that we can appreciate the irretrievable harm that is bound to come unless we check this unnatural competition to secure the wealth of the Nation.

In practically every city of the Union there is a shortage of homes. Building has fallen far short of the demand. One of the dominant factors in building operations is the ability to finance the operations, and this ultimately means the placing of mortgages upon the homes as they are sold to the purchasers. Upon investigation one will learn that mortgage money is hard to get except at a premium, for the reason that millions of dollars that were formerly invested in first mortgages have been withdrawn from the market and invested in tax-free securities. Trust companies and large insurance companies formerly were eager to secure mortgage investments, but statistics will show that in the past three years they have invested millions of dollars in tax-exempt securities, and that their investment in mortgages have decreased alarmingly. Not only has mortgage money taken a decisive slump in the cities but farm mortgages have been affected even more seriously. The hardship falls far heavier on the man of small income who desires to acquire a home and the farmer who wishes to own his farm for the reason that he is obliged to pay a much higher rate of interest and in addition encounters greater difficulty in his ability to finance his wants. Such a situation creates an unequal opportunity and stifles the incentive, which in the past has been such a vital factor in the development of our country. It is the home owners in our villages and cities and the farmer whose productive lands have always been his pride that has made this country the marvel of the world. Any economic evil that destroys this natural incentive must be corrected, and no time can be wasted in doing it.

We are confronted by another danger that is most menacing in its effects, and that is that capital which used to stimulate and maintain industry is being withdrawn and invested in these tax-free securities, at a time when every encouragement should be extended to industry so that employment may continue and new wealth created. It may be asked, "Why is capital deserting industrial investments?" The answer is simple when we realize that a man who has an income of $250,000 a year, and has his money invested in industrial bonds or stocks must realize 12 per cent on his investment to secure a net return to himself after paying his Federal tax of 5 per cent. In other words, if he has his money invested in 5 per cent tax-free bonds he has just as much as if though his industrial bonds netted him 12 per cent, for the reason that he must pay upon his income of $250,000 a total Federal tax of 58 per cent—a normal tax of 8 per cent and an added surtax of 50 per cent. Naturally, no sane and responsible business man will agree to pay 12 per cent interest for money. Only the promoter of uncertain securities would undertake to do so, for only few legitimate industrial investments produce a net return of 12 per cent; therefore the man of large wealth will not expose his capital to such dangers when he can secure safe and certain investments that yield him a net income equal to that of a gross income of 12 per cent.

There was a time in the history of our country when Government bonds were bought mainly by the man who had accumulated a moderate capital, but who wished to invest his income in the safest security available and was content to receive a low rate of interest. These bonds held forth little attraction to the man of large wealth for he desired a far higher return upon his money, but to-day we find the situation changed. It is the rich man who formerly dealt almost exclusively in industrial and railway securities who now seeks these tax-free bonds with all the benefits accruing to him by their exemptions.

Another field of activity that has been very seriously embarrassed by the issuance of tax-exempt securities are the steam railways. They are the arteries of trade; but the transportation rates have been so high that they have seriously impeded the natural interchange of commerce. One of the greatest problems that the railroads have to grapple with is that of finance. Before the World War it was comparatively easy for railroads to secure what financial assistance they required to keep up their rolling stock and for legitimate expansion. But the past few years their market for capital has been restricted to such a degree that they have been unable to finance their requirements, and what financial assistance they have gotten has been acquired at an exceedingly high rate of interest and excessive expense. In the past the very rich of the Nation always found railroad securities most attractive, but since their earnings have been so precarious and the stability of the investment so impaired, they have turned their backs on them and are finding safety and refuge in tax-free securities.

All of this increased cost in the financing of the railroads reflects itself in the transportation rates, which continue to be one of the principal contributing factors which are responsible for the high price of merchandising. It affects everybody alike in that the ultimate consumer must pay the bill. What is true of the railroads is equally true of the public utilities. The street railways, gas and electric plants have had, and are still having, their embarrassments. Very few present a healthy condition. They no longer find a ready market for their securities.

Their customers of former days are no longer willing to assist them by buying their bonds, even though they are willing to pay as high as 8 per cent interest. It is stated with reliability that the railroads and the public utility corporations of the country require annually about $2,000,000,000 with which to finance their operating needs. In order to secure this great assistance one can readily see what great difficulties they must meet with, and what great expense they are put to in order that they may be permitted to live. All of these increased burdens are paid for in increased trolley fares, gas and electric-light service by the consuming public.

Another very serious aspect of this proposition is the fact that the very rich of the Nation are relieved from taxation and that with each year the available taxable property is growing smaller by the refuge which the rich man finds for his capital in tax-free securities. It is estimated that the Federal Government loses this year $300,000,000 in taxes by reason of these exemptions. What is the natural result? None other than those least able to pay must carry the national burden of government. In other words, those who earn their incomes must pay the taxes, whereas those who have an unearned income flowing in from tax-free securities pay nothing. This situation creates two classes of Americans—the taxable and the nontaxable. To-day 7,000,000 persons are paying the taxes of the Federal Government. Next year this number will decrease, thereby adding an additional burden upon the remainder whose incomes are earned. What justice can there be where a man who has an earned income of $10,000 pays to the Federal Government a tax of $520, whereas the man who has a $10,000 income derived from tax-free bonds pays nothing? A manufacturer who has an earned income from his business of $300,000 pays to his Government a Federal tax of $144,000, whereas the millionaire who has a like income of $300,000 from tax-free bonds pays nothing. When the truth of such a glaring injustice becomes generally known to the public, I feel confident that an overwhelming public sentiment will respond in condemning a national situation that will permit of such gross injustice being practiced, and that it will insist upon the immediate adoption and ratification of the proposed constitutional amendment prohibiting the further issuance of tax-free securities.

It is contended that by the adoption of the proposed amendment that those who invested in these tax-free securities would be greatly enriched by their advance in value and that it would be unfair to give these favored holders of tax-free securities an additional advantage. No one will dispute the fact that the outstanding securities will increase in value for the reason that the amendment is not retroactive, but only proposes to prevent the issuance in the future of any more of these free securities.

Whatever the gain to the present holders of these securities may be, I feel confident that the correction of so great a national evil will far outweigh any added consideration that these present holders might gain through the proposed elimination of so vicious a system of unequal taxation. Thus it will be seen what a serious situation has been developed throughout the country by the excessive issuance of these tax-free bonds, which has resulted in the tying up of the great surplus wealth of the Nation into passive investments.

In order that a nation may be prosperous, its wealth must be elastic and have a natural flow. It should be accessible to the farmer, the merchant, the manufacturer, the home builder, and all other active enterprises at all times, based upon natural merit and attraction, and not be stifled by unnatural economic favoritism. This present condition is unhealthy and unsound, and unless we act speedily to correct this economic evil we may, in the not far-distant future, encounter an economic catastrophe which may require the confiscation of private property to again restore the Nation's wealth into active channels in order that the stability and well-being of the Nation may be preserved.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, the methods of Federal taxation have been radically changed during the last 10 years, and other equally important changes will follow during the next 10 years.

Before the World War we were collecting, under the general fund of the Treasury, about equal amounts from customs and internal revenue. The postal receipts at that time approximated $266,000,000, making the total Federal revenues for all purposes about $990,000,000. The total revenues now collected for all purposes approximate $3,500,000,000.

The wise foresight of a Republican Congress under the administration of President Taft submitted to the States the sixteenth amendment to our Federal Constitution empowering Congress to lay and collect taxes on income. This was the most important change in our methods of Federal taxation. That amendment was proposed to the legislatures of the several States by the Sixty-first Congress and was declared, in a proclamation of the Secretary of State, dated February 25, 1913, to have been ratified by the legislatures of the requisite number of States, 36. Accordingly, it became a part of our Federal Constitution, and the way was thus prepared for income-tax legislation that followed soon thereafter. That amendment reads as follows:

The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes on incomes, from whatever source derived, without apportionment among the several States, and without regard to any census or enumeration.

Without this additional constitutional authority Congress would have been seriously embarrassed in providing funds to meet the requirements of the World War. During the fiscal years, 1918, 1919, 1920, $12,835,000,000 were secured through internal-revenue taxation, chiefly from taxes on incomes.

Prior to 1913 the Treasury received internal revenues ranging from $250,000,000 to $300,000,000 dollars annually. These figures show the results from revenue legislation enacted under the sixteenth amendment. The usefulness of this amendment is further disclosed by the revenues that must be secured under it permanently for an indefinite period of time, perhaps permanently.

Thus it appears that the income tax is now a permanent part of Federal taxation. It is quite important that taxpayers generally should draw a clear distinction between a property tax and an income tax. The States generally levy taxes on property, while the Federal Government does not employ property taxes in any form. Under the sixteenth amendment, however, the Federal Government taxes the incomes of individuals and corporations within fixed limitations. We now have an annual fixed charge of nearly $1,000,000,000 to pay interest on our public debt; about $450,000,000 to $500,000,000 for the benefit of the disabled soldiers of the World War; approximately $1,500,000,000 for the annual running expenses of the Government, and about $500,000,000 to cancel obligations growing out of the World War and such public improvements as the interests of the people generally may require; these facts and figures clearly prove that a large amount of revenue must be secured annually from a tax on incomes.

An income tax should be intelligently graduated so that great wealth will be compelled to bear its full share of Federal expenses.

The pending resolution will, if submitted to the States and ratified by them, close an avenue—tax-exemption securities—through which billions of dollars are now seeking refuge from taxation. It is estimated that fifteen hundred million dollars of taxable wealth was invested in tax-exempt securities during the last calendar year—1922—and that the total investments in such securities now approximate $16,000,000,000. Unless we are seeking to release great wealth from any share in the burdens of taxation we must vote for the submission of this amendment, and the States must ratify it. How can any Member consistently vote to levy taxes upon great wealth and then vote against this amendment? Such inconsistency is not expected from any Member of this House or from any State. The resolution reads as follows:

ARTICLE —.

SECTION 1. The United States shall have power to lay and collect taxes on income derived from securities issued, after the ratification of this article, by or under the authority of any State, but without discrimination against income derived from such securities and in favor of income derived from securities issued, after the ratification of this article, by or under the authority of the United States or any other State.

SEC. 2. Each State shall have power to lay and collect taxes on income derived by its residents from securities issued after the ratification of this article, by or under the authority of the United States; but without discrimination against income derived from such securities and in favor of income derived from securities issued, after the ratification of this article, by or under authority of such State. (H. J. Res. 314, Report 969.)

The revenue act of November 23, 1921, provides for an individual tax of 8 per cent of the amount of the net income and also a surtax of 1 per cent of the amount by which the net income exceeds $6,000 and does not exceed $10,000. The rate of surtax gradually increases with the increase of net income until it reaches 50 per cent of the amount by which the net income exceeds $200,000. Beyond the limit of $200,000 net income the Government is to receive 50 per cent or one-half of the total net income. At this point those who are receiving large incomes begin to search for lines of investment. When they find that a tax-exempt security will yield a better rate of return without risk and care than productive enterprises will yield tax-exempt securities become very attractive. They furnish in this way not only an escape of capital from taxation and productive enterprise, but they also encourage idleness on the part of many people who would otherwise be producers.

The Member who voted as I did for these higher rates of surtaxes is logically compelled to vote for the adoption of this resolution.

Otherwise a vast amount of wealth will withdraw from productive pursuits and go on deposit in a "bank of refuge," called "tax-exempt securities."

A vote against this resolution leads inevitably to that result. That means that the people with moderate incomes will pay more taxes while the rich will pay less.

Take an illustration: The man who has a net income of $200,000 will pay a normal tax of $15,680 for 1922 and a surtax of $70,960, or a total of $86,640, or 43.3 per cent of his net income. If his net income should be $300,000, his surtax would be $70,960 plus one-half of the excess over $200,000 ($50,000), or $120,960, while his normal tax would be $23,680 and his total tax $144,640, or 48.2 per cent of his net income. A net income of $500,000 would pay 52.1 per cent, or $260,640, into the Federal Treasury, while one of $1,000,000 would pay 55 per cent into the Treasury, or $550,640. These taxes would be secured from capital employed in productive business pursuits. Like net incomes from tax-exempt securities, however, would pay nothing. It is our imperative duty to amend our Federal Constitution by the adoption of this resolution.

STATE RIGHTS.

It is argued by some that we dare not confer upon the Congress the authority to tax the incomes from State, county, municipal, and school bonds, because it might go so far as to levy rates of confiscation upon such incomes. That argument proves entirely too much. It involves the idea that we dare not risk the Congress in this matter because of the fear that State credits might be destroyed. This argument logically implies that it is dangerous to delegate the taxing power to Congress for any purpose whatever. How, then, would the advocate of such a doctrine secure Federal revenues to pay the expenses of the Government?

According to that kind of political doctrine we dare not vest the legislatures of the States with the power of taxation. Where, then, would you lodge such power? Human beings somewhere must exercise that authority. The record of legislative bodies in the States and the Congress of the United States throughout the entire history of the Government refute that fallacious doctrine.

The submission of this resolution to the States for ratification will discharge the present duty of Congress. The States will then have an opportunity to say by ratification or rejection whether the great wealth of the country shall bear its just share of Federal taxation or whether on the other hand it shall go free while the people of moderate incomes must carry the principal part of the Federal burdens. To my mind there can be no reasonable doubt as to our imperative duty to submit and ratify this constitutional amendment and thereby equalize the burdens of taxation according to possessions and ability to pay. Let us therefore hasten this resolution to speedy submission and ratification.

The extension of remarks referred to is here printed in full as follows:

Mr. DEAL. Mr. Speaker, I shall cast my vote against the resolution under consideration. I regard it as another move on the part of those favoring a centralized government to weaken and break the power of the States. I can well understand that many of those who may vote for the submission of the proposed amendment can be and probably are prompted by other motives. Indeed, the debate indicates a diversity of reasons which no doubt have blinded some to the fact that each additional power delegated to the Federal Government is a liberty, reserved to the people by the Constitution, surrendered forever. A priceless heritage, purchased with the blood of our Revolutionary ancestors, exchanged for a "mess of pottage." Liberties intrusted to our care for the "peace, happiness, and prosperity" of our posterity are to be sacrificed at the demand of a class already favored with wealth far beyond its needs. Under the camouflage of reaching the "tax dodger" it is proposed to ask the States to surrender to the Federal Government their credit. Well may we invoke the adage, "Beware of the Greeks coming bearing gifts." Who are they most persistent in demanding the submission of this amendment? First comes the Secretary of the Treasury, a man whose ability and success in life commands our highest admiration, firing a broadside smoke screen for the proposed amendment upon the ground that surplus wealth is going into tax-exempt securities rather than into industrial development. It may be pertinent to refer to the remarks of Hon. JAMES A. FREAR on November 25 and December 7, 1922, in which he charges the Secretary with failure to enforce section 220 of the 1921 revenue act in not collecting surtaxes upon accumulated surpluses of certain corporations whose profits have ranged as high as 100 per cent. Mr. FREAR said:

I have briefly charged that upward of $2,000,000,000 in corporation-accumulated surpluses are disclosed to be given out as stock dividends. That Secretary Mellon's own Gulf Oil Co. started the wild melon-cutting race. That one purpose of sudden disclosures of huge profits is due to fear by great interests that tax laws by future Congresses may reach the enormous excess profits and tax dodging now practiced under Secretary Mellon's régime. That the tax administration of the Internal Revenue Office is still influenced by a small group of men in and out of the office, whose activities have become a public scandal, and that millions of dollars in penalties and surtaxes can be collected if the law is enforced affecting surpluses. I repeat that in my opinion Secretary Mellon should impose the 25 per cent penalty provided by section 220 on the enormous accumulated surpluses of corporations not needed in the business, leaving it for the corporation, wherever possible to do so, to justify its acts. In this I believe one of his own companies by declaring a 200 per cent stock dividend served to invite others to follow, until 900 per cent stock dividends, and even 1,600 per cent stock dividends, have been among the surpluses that are reported, and will thus avoid payment of personal surtaxes.

I do not agree with all that Mr. FREAR has said. I do not charge that Secretary Mellon has violated any law or sought by unfair means to evade the just payment of taxes by himself or those industries in which he is financially interested, nor do I claim that he has aided others so to do; but I do think that it ill becomes one of his reputed wealth to attack and seek to take from the people by constitutional amendment any part of their credit, so necessary for the development of our roads, our schools, our sewerage, our water supply, or public utilities.

The President, acting, it may be, upon the advice of his Secretary of the Treasury, recommended the submission of the resolution under consideration upon the ground that it is necessary to "lawfully restrict the issues of tax-exempt securities" and to curb the "extravagance of the States and municipalities." Has there ever been a more unwarranted attack upon an enlightened people? He whose every power has been delegated by those whose credit he now seeks to impair and whose remaining power he would absorb would thus destroy the most valuable asset of local government. Apparently the President ignores restrictions placed by State laws upon such issues. In my State the limit upon municipalities is 18 per cent of the assessed value of real and personal property, and State issues are not in excess of 10 per cent, while the average assessments do not exceed 50 per cent of real values. There has been no difficulty in borrowing from the most scrupulous lender even when there was no tax upon incomes from any source, indeed the lender will always regulate the danger line, but it would seem that the President and his Secretary want to stop the people from building roads for their own profit and comfort and pleasure. Good roads are competitors of the railroad, so highway building must be stopped and the money diverted to big business and the railroads. The power to tax is the power to destroy. Poverty is weakness. Wealth is power. Our principal financial reservoir has been absorbed by the Federal Government through the medium of the income tax. Yield our credit to the tender mercies of the Federal Government, and the advocates of a centralized Government will have accomplished their purpose.

Curb the "extravagance of the States," indeed. Nothing is rich or poor, strong or weak, extravagant or penurious except by comparison. Let us examine briefly the real situation: Prior to the World War and for many decades the per capita tax by the Federal Government, direct and indirect, had been and was about $9. The per capita tax of the States ranged around $5 to $7; of counties, $5 to $10; or cities, varying amounts from $10 to $30. There was no fear then of the downfall of the Republic by reason of State and municipal extravagance. There was not the slightest suggestion of bankruptcy, but now danger has been sensed, the red flag has been hoisted. The States and subdivisions thereof, notwithstanding the high cost and values, superinduced by the war and the abnormal extravagances of the Federal Government, have scarcely increased the average per capita tax upon their citizens in excess of 12½ per cent. While the Federal Government, the head of which fears such dire results unless the "extravagance of the people" can be curbed, is laying a per capita tax of more than $40 upon the people, or an increase of more than 400 per cent. These figures may not be absolutely correct, but it will scarcely be denied that they are approximately so. Sufficiently so to illustrate the absurdity of the suggestion that the people can not be trusted to tax themselves. Briefly, let us examine that for which these taxes are laid and bonds issued and the returns that we get.

The Federal Government is spending $40 per capita, the State and municipalities combined $40 per capita. That is about the tax in my State and city, which does not differ materially from the ratio of taxes in other States. From the Federal Government we receive protection from invasion by foreign foes, a guaranty of a republican form of government, $65,000,000 for roads, $42,000,000 for rivers and harbors, less than $5,000,000 for maternity and education, while we pay from incomes alone $1,150,000,000, and from all sources more than $4,000,000,000 to the Federal Government annually. From the State and city we receive education for our children, sewerage and water to promote health, paved streets, sidewalks, drainage, police protection, fire protection, roads, and other advantages not enumerated, all conducing to the peace, health, happiness, and contentment of our people. It is to curb and take away from us these things in part that the resolution under consideration is intended. On this floor, leading most vigorously the fight for the resolution, we find the great captains of wealth in the forefront asking that State securities shall hereafter be taxed, pleading that wealth be taxed, and at the same time inveighing against the high surtaxes. "Beware of the Greeks coming bearing gifts." If State and municipal securities need being taxed, the State now has that power. If Federal securities need being taxed, Congress has the power so to do. If the people want them taxed, it will be done. It should not be done in opposition to their uninfluenced will in the interest of capital and those who seek to raid the Federal Treasury.

The ratification of the sixteenth amendment enabled the Federal Government to absorb the principal financial reservoir of the States. Had the States foreseen the lengths to which the Federal Government would go in taxing incomes and its results the sixteenth amendment would never, in my opinion, have been ratified. Had it not been done, there are few, if any, States that would need to issue a bond for any amount.

The Federal income tax taken from my State during the past fiscal year, and it is below the average income yield from all of the States, covered into the State, county, and city treasuries annually would far more than provide for all of our public needs, including the development of our waterways, our harbors and terminals, without the aid of one dollar from the Federal Treasury. Were Congress denied the right to tax incomes and forced to lay a direct tax, economy would be practiced, the reckless orgy of spending, wasting, and unheard-of extravagances by the Federal Government would have been to a large extent avoided. The war gave warrant for excessive taxation, but what defense can we offer for our enormous expenditures five years after the war? The gentleman from the seventeenth district of New York, Mr. OGDEN MILLS, in a speech delivered on the floor of the House December 19, 1922, submitted a table of income yield from municipal and industrial bonds through a period of 52 years, showing but a slight difference in favor of the municipal bonds. From this it is undertaken to show that the value of the tax-exempt municipal bond would not be materially impaired should the Federal Government be empowered to tax the same and exercise that power. We should not lose sight of the fact that during 43 years of this period incomes were not taxed from any source and for nearly 5 years after the ratification of the sixteenth amendment the income tax, relatively, was nominal. From the declaration of war until now the disturbed condition of business and values would not suggest this as a period in which a normal comparison can be justly made. The suggestion that a tax-exempt bond would not yield far more on the market than a taxed bond seems strange and illogical. I submit that he who purchases a tax-exempt bond is not a tax dodger. I submit that he pays the tax in the enhanced value of the bond and the lower rate of interest that he receives for his money.

Water seeks its level, and so does the market for money. To whom are State and municipal bonds sold? Do we peddle them out in small amounts to local investors? Certainly not. They are usually sold in bloc to trust, insurance, or banking companies and are absorbed by those whose incomes are subject to the higher brackets of the graduated income tax. Now, when the bond is offered for sale the prospective purchaser first wants to know the rate of interest it bears. When told that the rate is, say, 4½ per cent, he next inquires what discount from the par value will be allowed; when told that the par value is expected, he will naturally decline to purchase. If requested to make an offer for the same, he begins to figure the amount the Government will take from him, and then he inquires if the State will also tax the income. Suppose he finds that the State will lay a tax of 2 per cent and the Federal Government takes a flat tax of 8 per cent and then a surtax of 50 per cent, altogether 60 per cent of the income, leaving only 1.8 per cent net. Can anyone think for a moment that the investor would purchase such bonds at par? Certainly not. He would probably offer 50 to 60 cents on the dollar, and thus the "extravagance of the people" would be curbed. Incidentally, civic development, with all of its attendant evils, would be curbed. Would the public install sewerage, pave streets, build roads and water systems at the price? No; local government would collapse and we would be forced to go to the Federal Government for aid, and surrender other privileges and liberties for that aid. We would have to contend with Federal red tape, with all of the inefficiency, waste, and graft incident to a bureaucratic régime. It would, in my opinion, lead to a Federal land tax, license tax, and a multiplicity of Federal agents, detectives, and spies.

I suppose the proponents of this resolution will ridicule these suggestions. If so, permit me to call your attention to the Federal enforcement of the sixteenth and eighteenth amendments to the Constitution, with the hosts of detectives and spies dodging the footsteps of men who thought that they were free until the State legislatures, responding to the maudlin sentiment of the demagogue and fanatic, ratified the sixteenth and eighteenth amendments. What man or woman can now boast of freedom? Of what protection is the fourth amendment of the Constitution when a Federal officer can and does walk into your office or home and examines your private books and papers and personal effects without a warrant; when the Federal Government supports these underlings in the assumption that every man and woman is a thief who has made two blades of grass grow where one formerly grew, and places the burden upon the citizens of proving his or her innocence? Congress alone is empowered to make laws; when in violation of the spirit, if not the direct mandate of that Constitution which each Member takes a solemn oath to support and keep inviolate, Congress delegates to the administrative department of the Government the power to make rules and regulations for the enforcement of law—in reality the power to make laws which can be changed every morning before breakfast, to the confusion and persecution of American citizens. What man or woman in full possession of his or her faculties would knowingly surrender one atom of his or her liberty and that of their children and their children's children to the mercy of a Congress that has so abused its trust? The sixteenth amendment has done more to break down and destroy the sovereignty of the States than all other acts combined since the foundation of our Government, and why, because if the States surrender to the Federal Government an inch of the power reserved to the citizen Congress immediately proceeds to take the proverbial ell.

In the case of the sixteenth amendment, where is the warrant for taxing one man or woman at one rate and another at a different rate? Is this equality before the law? Is it just? Is it fair? Is it honest? Can we censure the man for disloyalty who, under the promise of his Government that if he will labor and practice self-denial he and his posterity shall enjoy the fruits of that labor, only to find in old age that his Government seeks his financial destruction by unjust taxation and persecution? The ratification of the resolution under consideration I submit would intensify the evils of the sixteenth amendment and vastly aid in the destruction of local self-government. The gentleman from the first district of Ohio is quoted as having said that "unless we adopt this amendment in a very short time the whole system of graduated income tax will fall." I think, Mr. Speaker, that it will fall if it does not fall, because a graduated tax is an unjust tax; but the solicitude of the gentleman from the first district of Ohio, the gentleman from the seventeenth district of New York, and the gentleman from the first district of Massachusetts for the preservation of the system of the graduated income tax law is hardly consistent with their attitude in fighting to reduce the maximum graduated tax from 50 to 32 per cent. I voted with them then, not because I thought the principle was right, but because it was a step in the right direction and the best that could be had. There was no difference in the principle of those who supported the 32 per cent maximum and those who supported the 50 per cent maximum tax. I am opposed to any graduated tax. The principle is wrong, but these gentlemen supposed to represent especially great wealth have proven by their acts that they have no love for the graduated tax.

Can their solicitude for the destruction of tax-exempt securities be prompted in part by the thought that if the market for State and municipal securities is weakened, perhaps destroyed, the people will clamor for a repeal of the graded tax in order to market their bonds? In part to discourage the growing tendency of municipalities to enter those fields of endeavor heretofore exclusively enjoyed by private capital? In part through fear that the large bonded issues will place upon them a heavier burden in carrying charges and sinking funds? In part to enhance the value of the exempted bonds now claimed to be in the hands of the wealthy? In part to stop the sale of State bonds and thereby create a market for industrial bonds? In part to prevent highway development and thus reopen the field for watered stocks and bonds of industrials and transportation? I submit that the danger of an overissue of State tax-exempt securities is negligible; all States limit by law bond issues. Investors in such securities will not purchase in excess of this limit. The taxpayer will not stand for excessive land taxes, and State representatives are afraid to impose heavy direct taxes, just as Congress shies at a sales tax. The Secretary of the Treasury and the President first proposed, in the interest of capital, to reduce the graduated tax. Failing in part, they felt out the sales-tax idea in connection with the soldier bonus. Seeing that this could not be worked, the tax-exempt securities scheme has been handed out from the Treasury Department. If, as its proponents claim, State securities will under the tax plan drop back to pre-war sales, probably less, where will the Government get the cash to meet its proposed bonuses and pensions and gifts to sugar speculators, and Russian gifts and Liberian loans, and the proposed German loan of $1,000,000,000 to be spent for wheat in America, and finally to pay our $23,000,000,000 debt?

Mr. Speaker, tax-exempt securities are not reducing the Government revenues, because the Government never had the revenue from this source. The unreasonable, foolish, unjust graduated income tax, and the persecution of business men by Mr. Mellon's bureau, and not tax-exempt securities is driving capital out of industry, closing the door of opportunity in the faces of our young men, destroying credit, and "drying up" the wells of enterprise and ambition. Our population and wealth have greatly increased. The demands of civilization are in proportion. Improved highways are a recognized necessity. There is more wealth to invest in bonds without in any sense disturbing the status quo heretofore obtaining. Improved highways will increase the values of realty, the base of State and municipal revenue. This source of revenue must take the place of income taxes, of which a monopoly has practically been assumed by the Federal Government. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that every man representing his State in Congress should bend his every effort to curb the extravagance of the Federal Government, rather than throttle the necessary development of those things that touch so closely the prosperity and happiness of those whom he is supposed to represent. As to the provision that the State may tax incomes from Federal securities, no human mind can foresee the confusion to which such an attempt would lead, if indeed it should lead anywhere. Forty-eight States acting separately could scarcely reach an accord as to a proper rate, or upon any rate, for taxation. It means nothing save to becloud the situation and as an argument that the State is to receive some return for its concession, or to present the semblance of fairness.

The passing of the sovereignty of the State must sooner or later lead to the dissolution of the Republic. Congress can only enact laws that will apply to all alike; laws affecting the domestic relations of life on the Atlantic seaboard may not, and probably would not, in any sense appeal to the happiness of the people living upon the Pacific coast, or vice versa. It would be impracticable and a dead letter. Cast aside, if you please, every other consideration and weigh the President's words:

I suggest the submission of an amendment so that we may lawfully restrict—

And so forth.

I renew that recommendation now.

So that who may control? "We," the President and Secretary Mellon and his capitalistic class, of course. And what does he propose to control? Why, the people. Can there be anything plainer than that the free exercise of the liberty of the people to control as they please that for which they labor is to be denied to them, is to be taken away from them; that they are to be reduced to subserviency, to the absolute will of the king?

Mr. Speaker, if there were no other reason than the proposed surrender of control for ever and ever to a central power a liberty of the people I would oppose it to the death. Caesar Augustus, as consul, chafing at the restraints of the Roman law and the power of the senate, recommended to the Roman senate that it pass a resolution abolishing the republic and the creation of an empire with himself as emperor. The resolution was passed, and it is said that a Roman senator, when asked why the senate betrayed the trust of the people, replied that some one offered the resolution and the rest were afraid to vote against it. I am wondering if there are any of this body who will vote for this resolution counter to his judgment.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

INVESTIGATION OF CROP INSURANCE.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I desire to ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate Resolution 413. I am sure it will not lead to debate. I have no purpose to delay the consideration of the pending bill. In September of last year a committee was appointed to study farm crop insurance. That committee, under the resolution, was to report in February next. Because of various reasons they have been unable to do so. The resolution for which I intend to ask immediate consideration simply proposes that the time may be extended for the report of the committee until January 1, 1924. The resolution is not on the calendar, but I now, from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, to which it was referred, report it favorably without amendment and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. For the information of the Senate, the Secretary will read the resolution reported by the Senator from Oregon from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The Secretary read the resolution S. Res. 413, which was submitted by Mr. McNARY January 19, 1923, as follows:

Resolved, That the time for making report required of the committee appointed under Senate Resolution 341, agreed to September 9, 1922, is hereby extended to January 1, 1924.

Mr. McKELLAR. To what does the resolution relate?

Mr. McNARY. The committee have been making a study of crop insurance, but have been unable to complete its work.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have no objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution?

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I desire to have read a unanimous-consent proposal which I expect to submit to the Senate to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The reading clerk read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that on and after the calendar day of Monday, January 29, 1923, no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than two hours upon the shipping bill, nor more than once or longer than 30 minutes upon any amendment offered thereto, and on and after the calendar day of Monday, the 5th day of February, 1923, unless the bill is already disposed of, no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 30 minutes on the bill, nor more than once or longer than 10 minutes on any amendment that may be offered thereto.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not see the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], who is on the Committee on Commerce, in the Chamber.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am not asking for immediate action on the proposed unanimous-consent agreement. I shall ask for its consideration to-morrow.

Mr. McKELLAR. Very well.

IMPOSITION OF TARIFF DUTY ON WHITE ARSENIC.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, the District of Columbia appropriation bill is pending before the Senate, but I wish to call attention to a matter of, perhaps, more importance to the public at large than any other subject which could engage our attention. During the discussion and consideration of the tariff bill before its passage I offered an amendment to the bill proposing to put white arsenic on the free list. That amendment was adopted by an overwhelming vote on the Republican side, as well as the Democratic side, of the Chamber. It was done largely because it was made apparent that, perhaps, the greatest source of income to American commerce was being jeopardized. Even those Republicans who originally advocated a tariff duty on the commodity were willing to waive their views in order to aid in the fight against the pest that is rapidly destroying the cotton crop of the South. Billions of dollars of property are being destroyed, and the prosperity of the New England and the southern cotton mills is at this moment jeopardized because of the ravages of the boll weevil. The ginners' report for the middle of January, which came out yesterday, discloses that we have only a little over 9,500,000 bales of cotton to supply a 15,000,000-bale demand. The consumption of cotton by the American mills before the World War was on an average of about 4,500,000 bales yearly. Under the stimulus of war and the demand for cotton goods the consumption of cotton by American mills rose to something like 7,000,000 bales. Last year we made a little less than 8,000,000 bales. We carried over a surplus from preceding crops and preceding consumption which supplemented that short crop and gave an approximately adequate supply for the consumption year which ended August 1, 1922.

Now, we are in the consumption year extending from August 1, 1922, to August 1, 1923, with a probable demand of nearly 14,000,000 bales of cotton and with less than a 10,000,000-bale supply, or, with the surplus carried over, not to exceed a 12,000,000-bale supply of American cotton; so that the outlook for an adequate supply of this indispensable article of human consumption seems to be almost hopeless unless we can find some means by which to meet and overcome the ravages of the boll weevil.

I am quite sure that there is not a Senator on this floor who fully appreciates the disastrous results of the impending destruction of the southern cotton crop. Mr. President, in the State of South Carolina I venture to assert that already 30 per cent of the tenants have left the State. On my own farm 80 per cent of the labor that has heretofore been engaged in the production of cotton has gone. I am informed that they have gone to the Northern and the Middle Atlantic States; some have gone to Maryland; others have gone to Pennsylvania and Ohio; they are leaving by the thousands. Not only is there a tremendous menace in the loss of this American monopoly but there is involved demoralization in every department of our industry, due to the fact that the keystone of the arch has been knocked out. The effect will be felt by every industry east of the Rocky Mountains.

In the time that I propose to occupy I shall not go into the details in reference to this matter, but I wish to call attention to the ruling of the customs department in reference to the compound that we use in fighting this insect, namely, calcium arsenate. As I have said, under the amendment which I offered on the floor and which was adopted by an overwhelming majority we put sulphide of arsenic and arsenious acid or white arsenic on the free list under paragraphs 1512 and 1513 of the tariff act. The customs officials, however, claim that calcium arsenate is dutiable at 25 per cent ad valorem under the basket clause for the following reasons, which I should like Senators to hear:

In paragraph 1 there is a duty placed on the different articles therein mentioned, and arsenic acid bears a duty of 3 cents per pound. According to the definition of chemists arsenic acid and arsenious acid are interchangeable terms. We put arsenic acid or white arsenic on the free list, and the bill should have been corrected so that arsenic acid should also have been put upon the free list, because, as I have said, according to the chemists they are interchangeable terms; they are the same thing.

The paragraph under which calcium arsenate is held to be dutiable is the following:

All chemical elements, all chemical salts and compounds, all medicinal preparations, and all combinations and mixtures of any of the foregoing, all the foregoing obtained naturally or artificially and not specially provided for, 25 per cent ad valorem.

The Senate specifically put arsenious acid or white arsenic on the free list and the sulphide of arsenic on the free list.

Yet, by spelling the same thing in a different form, they have put the compound of arsenic acid, mainly a mixture of lime, on the dutiable list. If there were a difference between arsenic and arsenious acid, it would not apply to calcium arsenate, because calcium arsenate is made from white arsenic, which is on the free list. Therefore, since calcium arsenate is made from white arsenic, which is on the free list, and from lime, which is unlimited—we have mountains of it—no form of which is on the dutiable list, I claim that the customs department is in error in putting calcium arsenate, which is a compound of free articles, upon the dutiable list, because that compound is not named in the tariff specifically at all.

I have come to the Senate in order to advise my colleagues here that the object of our putting white arsenic on the free list, and sulphide of arsenic on the free list, was to give the markets of the world to those who were attempting to save the American cotton crop from the ravages of this pest. Now, when we have gotten the ingredients on the free list, what advantage is it to us if the form in which the article must be used is on the dutiable list? It defeats the very object of the legislation that you so splendidly granted not only the South but the American people in fighting to maintain their great monopoly of the textile production of the world; and I am waiting to-day to find if the customs department is going to change this ruling. If not, I shall introduce a resolution asking that calcium arsenate, which we had in view at the time we put these ingredients on the free list, shall be placed upon the free list, so that wherever this thing is manufactured and can be sold in this country at the lowest possible cost to the already overburdened producers of cotton, they shall have the benefit thereof.

I thought I would take this occasion this morning to call the attention of the public to the fact that the intent and purpose of Congress was to put this ingredient on the free list, and allow the public to get it where they could—not white arsenic alone but the compound that was proposed by the Agricultural Department as being the ingredient that would in a manner help to eradicate or control this pest.

If we are to have our calcium arsenate dutiable, it is the very form in which white arsenic is made available as an insecticide; and if the department claim that under the terms of the present law they must impose this duty, then I shall offer a resolution immediately upon the receipt of that knowledge from the department, and ask my colleagues here to see that the intent of Congress is carried out.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed consideration of the bill (H. R. 13660) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I ask that the Secretary proceed with the reading of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will continue the reading of the bill.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

Mr. PHIPPS. That goes over for consideration with other items in the same category.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be passed over.

Mr. PHIPPS. The next amendment is on line 9.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

Mr. PHIPPS. That also is an item which will go over in accordance with the understanding.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be passed over.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head "Charities and corrections, Board of Charities," on page 75, line 8, to increase the appropriation for maintenance of four motor ambulances from "$1,600" to "$1,800."

For maintenance, custody, clothing, care, and support of inmates; rewards for fugitives; provisions, subsistence, medicine and hospital instruments, furniture, and quarters for guards and other employees and inmates; purchase of tools and equipment; purchase and maintenance of farm implements, live stock, tools, equipment; transportation and means of transportation; maintenance and operation of means of transportation; supplies and labor, and all other necessary items, $60,000.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator give us an explanation of that item?

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, the practice of allowing an activity to collect money through the sale of articles it manufactures and use it to pay for the running expenses of the institution is one which we are trying to discourage. We did not permit this last year. It has been suggested heretofore; and instead of permitting them to use the money received from the sale of brooms for current expenses we think the practice of covering it into the Treasury should be followed. Therefore we raised the amount to $60,000.

Mr. McKELLAR. I agree with the Senator that that should be done.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I find that a correction is necessary in the location of the building. I send it to the desk in order that the amendments may be corrected to conform to the facts.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. In the amendment proposed by the committee strike out "1729 H Street NW." and insert "1800 D Street NW."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 88, after line 17, to insert:

COLUMBIA POLYTECHNIC INSTITUTE.

To aid the Columbia Polytechnic Institute for the Blind, located at 1808 H Street NW., to be expended under the direction of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, $1,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Office of Public Buildings and Grounds," on page 91, after line 22, to strike out:

For foremen, gardeners, mechanics, and laborers employed in the public grounds, $31,200.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, at that point I should like to make a little explanation as to these activities coming under the park service. They have been carried in a number of separate items—various small items of $2,000 and $3,000, and some even smaller amounts. We think it unnecessary to carry separate items for those matters and that better administration may be had by combining them. They are all under the charge of the superintendent in any event. Colonel Sherrill has charge of the buildings and grounds; and we have stricken out quite a lot of the language covering these separate items in the bill and combined it in two or three items, commencing on page 96.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, where is it on page 96?

Mr. PHIPPS. Beginning at the top of page 96 we give one item of $343,750, and then we have the separate items necessary to take care of the activities already in the bill. They are all in the bill as it came from the House. There is no change in the amounts, excepting beginning on page 96, line 16, where there are committee amendments; but the four items beginning at the top of page 96 take the place of the ones stricken out on pages 91, 92, 93, 94, and 95.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question? Is not this merely getting away from making specific appropriations and giving a lump-sum appropriation?

Mr. PHIPPS. No; because the various items are considered in the estimates made by the various minor officials and approved by the commissioners, and they go to the Budget, and all of that detail is available to the committee in considering the total appropriation.

Mr. CARAWAY. But it is not in the appropriation bill.

Mr. PHIPPS. So that the effect is this, if I may explain to the Senator: Where an item is $1,000 in one case and there is another item of $1,500, they might average $1,250 each without violation of the appropriation.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I think I can answer the Senator from Arkansas. I call attention to the wording of the amendment on page 96:

For improvement and care of public grounds in the District of Columbia, including foremen, gardeners, mechanics, laborers, office rent, maintenance, repair, exchange, and operation of not to exceed three motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles, and the maintenance, repair, exchange, and operation of motor cycles and bicycles for division foremen, $343,750.

It will be noted that this lump-sum appropriation is very admirably arranged to increase the number of motor-propelled passenger vehicles for the use of another class of our office-holders in the District of Columbia, namely, for division foremen, whoever a division foreman may be. I call attention to it for the purpose of showing that whenever it is possible these lump-sum appropriations are used for passenger-carrying vehicles for the various officials and employees and others connected with the Government.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I think at this point I should call the attention of the Senator from Tennessee to the language on page 94, which is identical with the language as transferred now to page 96, namely, "For improvement, care, and maintenance," and so forth. There is no intention to combine these with the idea of covering up anything. The language is identical with the language in the current law and the language as it came to us from the House.

Mr. McKELLAR. But the lump-sum appropriation is added to so that it can be switched around and the money utilized for the purpose of having as many motor passenger vehicles as possible.

Mr. PHIPPS. I can not agree with the Senator in that statement.

Mr. CARAWAY. Let me ask the Senator from Colorado if any purpose can be served here other than merely to save the printer's bill? The items which constitute the explicit directions to the commissioners for the expenditure of this money are stricken out and then a lump sum is appropriated for all these activities, as I gather from the bill.

Mr. PHIPPS. The intention of combining was not merely the saving of the cost of printing which might be involved, but it was in order to secure more latitude and better administration.

Mr. CARAWAY. Then the real purpose is to permit them to switch a fund from one purpose to another and use it wherever in their judgment they consider best?

Mr. PHIPPS. That is correct in a sense.

Mr. CARAWAY. Let me make a suggestion to the Senator from Colorado. It is easy to be critical, and I hope I do not impress the Senator that I merely want to criticize.

Mr. PHIPPS. Not at all.

Mr. CARAWAY. Under this peculiar form of government in the District of Columbia, I rather think there is less actual care given to the use of money appropriated than in any other municipality in the world. Let us take Irving Street, on which I live. It was dug up during the early fall three or four times, repaired, and resurfaced, and the next week it was dug up again from end to end. It was somewhat repaired, and then a lot of holes were dug in it two or three weeks later. There is no government except the government of the District of Columbia that would tolerate such a wasteful expenditure of money. I think a water main was laid after it was resurfaced. Just about the time it got so that one could get along without sticking to it, it was dug up again.

We have a rather ornamental commission in charge of affairs here. One of the members of the commission devoted all of his time for a while to trying to outrun Ford cars and seeing who were in them; if another member had any activities, nobody ever found it out, and the engineer commissioner put in most of his time trying to defend himself for not stopping to explain to every citizens' association what he intended doing. I believe the Senator from Colorado will agree with me that the government here has practically no administrative head.

Mr. PHIPPS. I will say very frankly that I could not agree with the Senator in that proposition. I have been in contact with the engineer commissioner, and I have a very high opinion of his ability as a business man, as a worker, and as a man with good ideas, and one who is earnest in his efforts to give good administration.

Mr. CARAWAY. Nobody said he was not earnest; but how many projects do they commence and quit? What became of the curbing along Connecticut Avenue?

Mr. PHIPPS. The proposition is to continue that as far as Chevy Chase Circle, and I think it is a good plan.

Mr. CARAWAY. Why was it abandoned?

Mr. PHIPPS. It was not abandoned. The fact is it was put in as an experiment, to demonstrate what was in the minds of the commissioners, and to draw forth comment. They were waited upon by a delegation of automobile users, who did not want to give the people who ride on trolley cars any consideration at all. The motive of the commissioners is to adopt that form where the roadway is wide enough.

For one-way traffic a 20-foot street would be wide enough for automobiles to pass, traffic moving in only one direction, thereby saving the expense of paving between and inside the tracks, because if the tramway company is compelled to expend that money in paving it becomes an investment, on which the authorities have to allow the companies to make earnings; and we are trying to get the car fares down.

Mr. CARAWAY. The fares in the District of Columbia are never reduced anyway. I am not saying it is not a wise thing, but there is no use expecting the present commission ever to reduce the rates of a utilities company in the District of Columbia. The commission always finds that the rates are reasonable, except where they find they are too low and raise them. They never find them to be too high.

Mr. BALL. Mr. President, the Public Utilities Commission reduced the fares about a year ago.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator remembers the row about the fares and how the commissioners have always found, as they did in the case of the telephone company, the companies get so much that even they themselves can not afford to say there should not be some kind of a reduction.

Returning to the experiment on Connecticut Avenue, great expenditures should not be made as an experiment.

Mr. PHIPPS. The place where the curbing was put in extends for about two and a half blocks.

Mr. CARAWAY. I know; I have seen it.

Mr. PHIPPS. It shows what the completed street would be under that plan. The object to be attained is to avoid, as they see it, unnecessary further capital expenditures on the part of the tramway company, so that they will not be in a strong position to say, "We can not reduce fares, because we are not making earnings."

Mr. CARAWAY. Everybody knows they will never reduce their fares. That is such an improbability that it does not amount to a reason at all. Recurring to Irving Street, can the Senator, as a great business man, justify the tearing up of the same street three or four times in that many months?

Mr. PHIPPS. No; certainly not; but, as a business man, if a resident on the street, I would have gone personally to the commissioners and endeavored to stop that right at the time; and I would like to ask the Senator if he made complaint in writing to the commissioners, calling their attention to it?

Mr. CARAWAY. No; I have never put in my time trying to tell another man how he ought to conduct his business. But the Senator is trying to defend the business administration of the District of Columbia, and I merely call his attention to it. If the commission do not know that Irving Street is in the District of Columbia, it might possibly have been wise for some one living upon it to call their attention to the fact, but it is a tolerably well-known street, it has been opened for a long number of years, it extends clear across the city, and I had naturally presumed that the city government would know there was a street by that name in the city.

Mr. PHIPPS. I do not think the Senator would expect the commissioner in charge of that particular work to visit Irving Street every week or every day. I should think that one having in mind the public interest and seeing a dereliction of that nature would call the attention of the commissioners to the fact.

Mr. CARAWAY. Who has the authority to authorize streets being torn up?

Mr. PHIPPS. The commissioner in charge of the street, or whoever he delegates.

Mr. CARAWAY. Why should I call his attention to it, when he has issued an order to have it done?

Mr. PHIPPS. In the public interest, I should think one would.

Mr. CARAWAY. He made the order. He knew, did he not, that he made the order to tear up the street? I know, and if the Senator was not overzealous to defend the District he would, that where you have divided authority, where public sentiment is not very acute as to the expenditure of the public funds, there is always waste. The taxes in the District of Columbia are so comparatively light, the Government of the United States pays such a large amount of the expenditures of the District, that the ordinary taxpayer is interested only in getting the appropriation, not in what is done with it after the appropriation has been made.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I do not think I have been overzealous in trying to defend those in charge of the District government. There have been times when I felt that it was advisable and proper to encourage them in things they were doing, such as the very paving we have spoken of. At other times I have not hesitated to criticize them, nor have I hesitated to call their attention to things coming under my observation which I did not feel were being carried out as they should be.

Mr. CARAWAY. I rather think that the time the Senator felt like criticizing them was some time ago. All I have ever heard from him recently has been commendation. Possibly that is as it should be; and I hope that I am not indulging in mere criticism. I was calling attention to the very evils which can come about from transferring a whole host of items, including the activities of the city government, into one lump-sum appropriation, and then letting people who have not a very great regard for what becomes of it to expend it as they see fit.

The very incident I called to the Senator's attention, as to the way Irving Street was handled, should challenge our attention. The Senator now undertakes to justify the city government by saying I am derelict in my duties because I did not quit the Senate and go and hunt up the man in charge of it and tell him to go down and see what they were doing when they knew they were doing it.

Mr. PHIPPS. The Senator is probably not aware of the fact that the items under discussion here do not come under the commissioners. As I stated, this comes under Colonel Sherrill, who is in charge of public buildings and grounds.

Mr. CARAWAY. Suppose it does come under Colonel Sherrill; I am talking about the unwisdom of gathering up all the items and letting one do just as he pleases with them. I know the Senator is a business man of rare ability, and I know he would not conduct his own business in that way. Since he speaks now for the people who pay the taxes of the District of Columbia he ought to see that the business of the District of Columbia is conducted as economically and as wisely as he would the business he himself has conducted in the past. I do not mean to apply my remarks to the Senator personally.

Mr. PHIPPS. I do not take any of those remarks as being personal. I say to the Senator, however, that the proposition of combining these items into one, or under two or three separate heads, instead of a great number, being all under the operation of the man in charge of parks, was considered by the subcommittee, and it was felt advisable to combine them. That proposition met with the favor of the Appropriations Committee when the bill was under review. We thought it was advisable to take it to conference with Members of the House and to discuss it there with them.

Mr. CARAWAY. I am not finding fault with the manner in which it was done; I am just venturing to suggest that it is an unwise system. If it were wise to combine these items, why not say, "We make an appropriation for the District of Columbia of so many millions of dollars. Here it is. Expend it as may seem wise."

Mr. PHIPPS. I am very glad to have the Senator's views on the point. If the items go to conference, I shall certainly bear them in mind. Admittedly there is force in the argument which he has presented.

Mr. CARAWAY. I have watched the matter of appropriations for some time. While I have never had the honor of being a member of the Appropriations Committee, and never sought such membership, I have noted the tendency on the part of those who are expending public moneys to have the appropriations handed to them freed of all restriction. The argument of all the departments has always been, "If we had that money so we could use it as we see fit, we could effect economy." I have heard that argument ever since I have been a Member of Congress. The present provision seems to me to be a yielding to that general desire to have the money turned over and expended in that way. I think it is unwise.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, the Senator from Arkansas had something to say about the fixing of street car fares in the District of Columbia. I want to call the attention of the Members of the Senate to a contract which seems to have been ignored by everybody, including the Utilities Commission and those in charge of the Washington government.

I call attention to the contract entered into between the Capital Traction Co. and the city of Washington, in which it is said in part:

Said company shall receive a rate of fare not exceeding 5 cents for each passenger for each continuous ride between all points of its main and branch lines, but shall sell tickets in packages of six each for not exceeding 25 cents per package.

In the Washington Railway & Electric Co. contract a similar provision about fares is contained in section 19:

That said company shall receive a rate of fare not exceeding 5 cents per passenger, but six tickets shall be sold for 25 cents: Provided, That the said company and the Capital Traction Co. are hereby required to issue free transfers, whereby a passenger on the said East Washington Heights Traction Co. shall be entitled to a continuous ride over the line of the other company, or vice versa.

During the war, I understand, as a war measure, the Utilities Commission authorized the companies to violate their contracts.

My recollection is from newspaper stories which I read at the time that the Capital Traction Co. protested against being required to raise its fares to 8 cents, but was required to do it anyway, and the public of Washington, who have to use the street cars, are still charged 6 tickets for 40 cents, or, where they pay cash, an 8-cent fare.

Mr. President, I want to protest against this action of the Public Utilities Commission and the city government. It ought not to be permitted. The Congress owes it to the people who have to use the cars here to require the two companies to stand by their contracts. It is remarkable that someone has not already tested the question in the courts as to the right of the commission to increase fares, and especially the right of the commission to increase them over the protest of one of the companies. I hope the Committee on the District of Columbia will look into the matter. I had hoped they would report a bill by this time requiring the companies to stand by their contracts and to furnish the people fares at 5 cents or six tickets for a quarter, as they should.

I looked over a statement of their earnings the other day, and I am sorry I have not the figures before me at this time. I shall undertake to get them and put them in the Record. My recollection is that one company passed to some improvement fund over a million dollars. I am just informed by a colleague sitting near me that it was over $3,000,000. At any rate, the annual reports of the companies show that they are making money and are doing splendidly. They could do splendidly and abide by their contracts and stand by their contracts to furnish the people of Washington service at 5 cents or six tickets for a quarter, as they have contracted to do. The war has been over several years.

Mr. SMITH. Was that in their contract?

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course it was in their contract, and if it were a contract with a State they could not violate it. A State government has no right to enact a law violating the terms of a contract or impairing the obligation of a contract, as it is usually termed, and we ought not to permit it in this case. I doubt if it is lawful, but even if it were lawful, even if it should by a technicality be held not to apply to the National Government, the Congress ought to protect the people of this city who are compelled to use street cars, the people who do not have automobile transportation legislated for them by the Congress, the people who have not enough pull with the Congress to have the Congress legislate private automobiles for their private use as well as for their public use. Their interests ought to be looked after, and I regret that the Committee on the District of Columbia have not reported a bill requiring the companies, long after the war, to reduce their fares in accordance with their contracts.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, of course that is legislation to which I believe the Committee on the District of Columbia has been giving consideration. Naturally, it could not be treated in any manner on the appropriation bill now under consideration.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will permit me, of course I understand that, but it is a matter which has been running on for a long time in the District. The citizens who have to use the street cars have had this enormous tax burden to bear for so long and the District Committee has been so dilatory when the matter was brought up by other Senators, that it seemed to me some Senator ought to speak out in behalf of the people of this city who have to use the street cars. There is no reason in the world why the street car companies should not be required to live up to their contracts.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I make a suggestion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN in the chair). Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. PHIPPS. Certainly.

Mr. CARAWAY. I should like to suggest to the Senator that, as I now recall, the Washington Railway & Electric Co. paid for their properties here about $8,000,000, certainly not to exceed $9,000,000, and now they have the properties capitalized for $30,000,000, and want the people to pay dividends on that capitalization.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course, and they are paying the bill, and so far as I know the Committee on the District of Columbia have done nothing in the world about it, and there has been no move whatever to prevent this enormous tax being continued upon the people of the District.

Mr. CARAWAY. That is what I want to call attention to in connection with the efficient government which the Senator from Colorado was eulogizing a moment ago—the active city government taking care of the interests of the people, when such a condition as that arises with their approval.

Mr. McKELLAR. It was a violation of the plain contract, and there has never been a protest on the part of any city official. There has never been a demand by any city official to require the companies which are confessedly making large sums of money, splendid incomes, and paying splendid dividends by charging the people of Washington more than is charged, I believe, in any city of the country, to reduce their rates. If we go to New York we can travel anywhere within the confines of that city for 5 cents. While the New York companies may not be making as much money as the Capital Traction Co. and the Washington Railway & Electric Co., they are managing to get along, and I have no doubt are doing fairly well. Surely the Congress ought to protect the people of Washington who have to use the street cars.

Mr. PHIPPS. At that time I was not a resident of Washington; I was a resident of the city of Denver, and I know what happened there. The War Labor Board ordered that the tramway lines there pay increased rates of compensation to their employees. The average increase in the city of Denver, as my recollection serves me, was about 60 per cent in the wages of labor. Those rates of pay were put into effect. Coincidentally the War Labor Board, having no right to order an increase in the passenger fares or rates, strongly recommended to the authorities of the city of Denver that permission be granted to increase the rates of fare.

I remember the telegram that was sent by the joint chairmen of the War Labor Board. The city authorities refused that permission, claiming a 5-cent fare contract similar to the one to which the Senator referred here. The business was conducted on the 5-cent fare for less than two years, when the company went into the hands of receivers, just as the New York transportation companies finally went into receiverships. That question is being thrashed out to-day. When the Denver company went into the hands of receivers and the United States court took jurisdiction the court ordered an increase in fares so that the company might be compensated for the extra outlay ordered by the War Labor Board. The question is now up for determination in the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN in the chair). Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. PHIPPS. Certainly.

Mr. CARAWAY. I desire to ask the Senator, because I am curious to know, what authority the War Labor Board had over the public utilities of the city of Denver?

Mr. PHIPPS. I tried to make my statement clear. The War Labor Board had authority over the pay for labor under the war exigency, and ordered that the rates of pay be increased. It could not order the authorities to permit an increase in fares, but strongly recommended such increase.

Mr. CARAWAY. I so understood the Senator. I did not know before that the War Labor Board had the right to say to a purely city public utility that it should raise its wages. Under what provision of the law did such an order go forward? It certainly was not issued here affecting the rates in the city of Washington.

Mr. PHIPPS. As I said, I was not a resident of Washington at that time and am not familiar with the action taken here, but I assume that the same action was taken here that was taken in Denver, in New York, and in other cities.

Mr. CARAWAY. I never knew before that the War Labor Board undertook to regulate the price of labor of street car companies.

Mr. PHIPPS. That is the fact.

Mr. CARAWAY. I rather imagined it was merely a matter of recommendation.

Mr. PHIPPS. Oh, no; it was an order.

Mr. CARAWAY. That is one thing that I am rather interested to know about. I knew they regulated practically everything else, but I never knew before that they regulated street car motormen's and conductors' wages.

Mr. PHIPPS. I believe the Senator will find that is correct. Mr. CARAWAY. I am not questioning the Senator's statement. I know it is true. I was merely thinking about the War Labor Board's usurpation of authority.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. PHIPPS. I do.

Mr. McKELLAR. Has the District Committee given any attention at all to an investigation of the question of fares on the street car lines here in the city of Washington?

Mr. PHIPPS. I am not a member of the District Committee, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. McKELLAR. I was under the misapprehension that the Senator was.

Mr. PHIPPS. I am not.

Mr. McKELLAR. In the Senator's capacity as a member of the Committee on Appropriations, having to do with District business, I am wondering whether or not the question of the salaries of the officials of the street car companies has ever been brought to his attention or that of the committee?

Mr. PHIPPS. No; in my recollection, it has not been.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator does not know, then, what salaries are paid to the presidents and other officers of the street car companies?

Mr. PHIPPS. I will say to the Senator that I have heard those salaries mentioned, but not by any authentic source of information, and I do not now even recall them.

Mr. McKELLAR. The officials of the street car companies are paid in keeping with the 8-cent fare on the cars, I apprehend, are they not?

Mr. PHIPPS. I will say to the Senator that I have no information that would throw any light on that point.

Mr. McKELLAR. I wish to call the attention of the Senate—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado further yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. PHIPPS. I do.

Mr. McKELLAR. As I understand, the Senator from Colorado had yielded the floor. I wish to be recognized in my own right.

Mr. PHIPPS. I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee is recognized.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, on this subject I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the constitutional provision that no State shall pass any "law impairing the obligation of contracts." Of course, the provision does not, in terms, declare that Congress shall not pass such a law; but I doubt whether a commission has the right to establish a rule impairing the obligation of the contracts between the two street railway companies here in the District of Columbia and the city of Washington or with the Congress itself. Whether a commission has such a right or not, surely that right ought not to be exercised to impair the obligation of the contracts which have been made. Even having done so, assuming that by some act of Congress it has been done, we surely ought not to continue it any longer. Congress owes it to itself and to a proper interpretation of the intent of the Constitution to see to it that these contracts are no longer violated. I hope the District Committee will report out a bill requiring the two street railway companies which are located here to live up to their contracts in reference to fares in the city of Washington.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the subject referred to by the able Senator from Tennessee is one which has received attention at the hands of the District Committee, of which, Senators may recall, I am a member. A number of propositions have been submitted to the committee for consideration, tending to solve what might be denominated the street car problem of the city of Washington. In my opinion, the committee has not been as diligent in the prosecution of this important task as it should have been. However, the conditions following the World War, the attempt to get down to a peace basis, have produced such mutations from day to day that the committee probably have looked upon these changes as an excuse for not offering some concrete plan and forcing legislation in reference to this matter.

Mr. President, I wish to say that the question of dealing with the street car companies throughout the United States and in the various municipalities is a very serious one. A few years ago there was a great deal of building of street car lines and extensions of such lines in municipalities; millions of dollars were expended in building up interurban electrical systems. In the great States of Indiana, Ohio, and Illinois, particularly, and many others, the names of which will readily recall themselves to Senators, there were hundreds, if not thousands, of miles of interurban street car lines established. Those street car line systems brought great benefit to the people; they brought the country in contact with the cities; they reduced freight charges; they enabled the farmers and the agriculturists to get their products, particularly milk products, and their vegetables to the cities at rates far less than those which had previously been established by the steam railroads. I venture the assertion, however, that during the past 10 or 15 years but very few miles of street car lines or of interurban electric lines have been built. I do not pretend to say that the street car lines and the interurban lines were improvidently managed or that incompetency characterized their administration; indeed, I am inclined to think that, generally speaking, the owners of such roads tried to operate them efficiently, so as to reap reasonable rewards. However, it may be said that many scandals have arisen in municipalities growing out of street car franchises. A franchise would be obtained and would be put into a corporation with an enormous capital. We know of the scandals in many of the cities—I shall not mention them—growing out of the improvident use of street car franchises and the corruption which was incident to the establishment of new street car lines within the cities.

During the past few years the road of the street car companies and of the interurban electric companies has been, generally speaking, in the language of the street, a "very rocky road." Many of the lines have gone into the hands of receivers. I repeat whether it was through improvidence and extravagance and maladministration I shall not pretend to state, but it is a fact that most of the street car companies for the four or five years immediately preceding our entrance into the Great World War proved unprofitable and paid but small, if any, dividends, and, in many instances, there were actual deficits.

Then the World War came on, and, as was stated by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS], the Labor Board projected itself—whether properly or improperly, I shall not pause to say—into the domestic affairs of the States, into the affairs of the municipalities, and into the contractual relations of private individuals. Rates were raised, and, of course, wages were advanced, as they should have been under the conditions then existing.

Mr. President, the condition in this city is very unsatisfactory with respect to the street car lines. I think that Congress ought immediately to deal with this subject. The two street car companies should be compelled by proper legislation, legislation that would not be destructive but constructive and would adequately and properly protect the right of bondholders and stockholders, to consolidate the lines, and then a just and fair rate should be fixed for the carrying of passengers within the District. Certainly the present situation is not only unsatisfactory but it is anomalous.

This question is before the District Committee, and during the next Congress—and if there should be a special session then during that special session—I hope the committee will take the matter up and report out one of the bills pending before it now, or a composite bill or a new bill, a measure of some kind, that will deal with this subject in a proper, in an effective, and in a just way.

ODD-LOT COTTON EXCHANGES.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, some days ago I introduced a bill providing penalties for persons who fraudulently fail to settle with parties who deal in future contracts, buying and selling agricultural products. That bill was referred to the Judiciary Committee, but has not as yet been reported by that committee. I hope that it will soon be reported.

I have in my hand a statement of the Odd-Lot Cotton Exchange of New York, the acts of which exchange particularly directed my attention to this matter. I see in the circular, which is "corrected to September, 1922," a list of firms eligible to that exchange. The circular states:

The following commission houses have complied with the requirements of the clearing-house department and are entitled to solicit general commission business.

After that, in alphabetical order, are named nine firms; but notwithstanding this list was corrected down to September 20, 1922, three out of those nine firms have since failed. My information is that some of the firms mentioned are of some standing, but that a number of them have been failures in other lines of business, have been kicked out of other exchanges, and are in bad repute.

There is no reason in the world why these firms should have failed if they had carried on a legitimate business. Their business is buying and selling odd lots, less than 100 bales, 100 bales being the minimum dealt in on the New York Cotton Exchange. The smaller exchanges appeal to people who are not well informed as a rule and to those who can ill afford to lose.

I have some correspondence in my office from some of my constituents, and also from people in other sections of the South, stating that they sent margins to some of these firms, naming them, and, notwithstanding handsome profits had been made, the firms refused to pay the profits or even to return the margin, and that at least one of these firms had itself placed in bankruptcy, showing that it owed over $100,000 and had assets of less than $10,000. Upon investigation, I find that that firm made money, or should have made money, because its clients were on the bull side of the market, and there is no reason why they should have lost money.

I am strongly of the opinion that Congress ought to pass a law punishing those who fraudulently neglect to settle with their clients; and that is the object of the bill which I have introduced and which I hope may be reported by the committee and passed at an early date.

The circular goes on to say:

Membership in the exchange is zealously guarded. Unadjusted claims of one member against another constitute a first lien on memberships. Cooperation and assistance of all members and of the public is cordially invited in keeping our membership up to the highest possible standard. Information in regard to any of our members will be kept confidential by the board of managers if requested.

Mr. President, my opinion is that they have robbed the South, going and coming.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. DIAL. Gladly.

Mr. CARAWAY. That is all a cotton exchange is ever organized for, is it not, namely, to rob the producing public? All the activities ever manifested and all the results that ever flowed from it show that, do they not?

Mr. DIAL. I would not like to put it that strong, although I am no defender of cotton exchanges.

Mr. CARAWAY. Did the Senator ever know anybody to make any money out of them legally?

Mr. DIAL. Very seldom.

Mr. CARAWAY. Did the Senator ever know anybody to make any money out of them?

Mr. DIAL. I think the statistics show that 98 per cent of those who deal with them lose; and that is a pretty strong indictment.

Mr. CARAWAY. And the 2 per cent that win are the professional gamblers who use them?

Mr. DIAL. I do not put it that way. Mr. President, it is time Congress was taking cognizance of the subject, and not only of these odd lots; of course, my bill did not refer to odd lots alone; it referred to the members of any exchange.

Mr. CARAWAY. May I ask the Senator another question?

Mr. DIAL. Yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. When does the Senator expect really to insist upon some action upon this measure?

Mr. DIAL. I am insisting every day.

Mr. CARAWAY. Has the Senator ever moved to make it the order of business in the Senate?

Mr. DIAL. The Senator misunderstands me. This last bill is before the Judiciary Committee, and they have not reported it. I am trying to get a report every day.

Mr. CARAWAY. I was referring to the Senator's bill regulating cotton exchanges.

Mr. DIAL. That amends the law. We had a vote on that the other day, and I hope to bring it to another vote pretty soon. That is a different proposition from the one I am speaking of now. This is before the Judiciary Committee, and provides a penalty for parties who refuse to settle with their clients.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator does not expect to hear from it soon, then?

Mr. DIAL. Yes; I hope so. The Judiciary Committee, I think, is looking into it, and I hope to have a report at an early date.

I merely want to bring to the attention of the Senate the great importance and necessity of quick action on this subject. I can not see why anyone should oppose a bill along the line of the one that I now have before the Judiciary Committee. As I understand, a great number of these people are experts in the business of defrauding their clients. I do not care to call names. I have the names in my office if anyone cares to see them. I merely want to show here that out of nine eligible members three have failed since the 20th of September, 1922. That shows the great mistake that people make in dealing with members who are not of good financial standing.

DISMISSALS FROM GOVERNMENT SERVICE.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I dislike very much to delay the speedy passage of this appropriation bill, but my attention has been called to an item which appeared in the Washington Herald of date Tuesday, January 23, 1923, under this headline:

Ousted Engraving Bureau workers vindicated.

I read:

SCANDAL PROBE FAILS TO SHOW ANY SHORTAGES IN OLD RÉGIME—TWENTY-EIGHT FORMER OFFICIALS ARE TO HAVE CIVIL-SERVICE RIGHTS RESTORED TO THEM—MAY BE GIVEN NEW JOBS—THREE WOMEN ALREADY PLACED, BUT NONE WILL GET AS GOOD POSITIONS AS THE ONES LOST.

(By John A. Kennedy.)

Withdrawal of the veil of suspicion shrouding the dismissal of 28 Bureau of Engraving and Printing officials from their posts last March will be accomplished within a few days, it became known yesterday.

Carrying with that gesture the complete vindication of what was generally conceded as political slaughter, the bureau officials will have their civil-service rights restored "without prejudice" after every investigating agency of the Government had probed deep into their activities.

TO GET SPEEDY ACTION.

Such a recommendation is in the hands of President Harding, and will probably be one of the first matters of importance cleared up when he returns to his desk, it was stated yesterday at the White House.

I shall not read the remainder of the article, but I ask that I may have the consent of the Senate to include the entire article in my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The remainder of the article is as follows:

But the order comes too late for at least one and possibly some others of the 28 summarily dismissed "for the good of the service" last March. E. I. Beech, one of the group, is dead. His death is attributed to worry over the stigma attached to his name after he had faithfully served the Government for more than a quarter of a century. Two others have taken jobs elsewhere.

FAIL TO FIND SCANDAL.

The administration by its failure to uncover any alleged "bureau scandal" adds the second chapter to the dramatic dismissal carried out at dusk on March 31, when President Harding issued an order discharging one set of officials who had served for many years and in their posts placing a complete new group to handle the bureau affairs.

On that night the men and women affected were separated from the service without notice and were forced to leave their desks under guard of secret-service agents. Hints of general shortages and similar character-damaging allegations were heard on every side in the weeks that followed.

The first word that the former administrators of the bureau were guiltless of any wrongdoing came in statements from high administration officials yesterday.

Three of the twenty-eight are already back at work in the Treasury Department, and according to the recommendation the rest will soon be "taken care of."

Cabinet officers and White House officials refused to estimate when the President will make the remainder of the group eligible to again work for the Government or to again enjoy the rights of retirement and raises in pay accorded those in the civil service. At the White House Secretary Christian said that when the President does sign the order it will be made public through the Treasury Department.

But when the men are given back their civil-service rights the old jobs in the bureau will not be for them. This was stated very positively last night by a Cabinet official. Similarly, Louis Hill, present director of the bureau, when asked if any of the men were coming back to his bureau, said, "They will not, sir."

Instead they will "be taken care of," according to the words of Secretary Mellon, who admitted yesterday afternoon that three women are already back in the service.

Under this plan it is understood the officials will be sent to posts in various other bureaus and departments of the Government at greatly reduced salaries.

Nor will the order be retroactive. The loss of 10 months' work and pay will stand, it is said.

WOMEN GIVEN WORK.

The women who have been returned to work, according to information furnished by the Secretary of the Treasury, are:

Mrs. Margaret S. Kerfoot, chief of the numbering division, who had a record of service of more than 38 years at the time of her dismissal. She was given a position in the Register of the Treasury on September 5 at a salary of $1,200 per year plus the special bonus. According to the Treasury officials, she was receiving $2,500 per year when she was summarily dismissed last April.

Miss Elizabeth Scott, who was chief of the packing division with a salary of $2,000 per year at the time of her dismissal, is now in the office of the Register of the Treasury. She had a record of 37 years of service. She was taken back on December 14 at a salary of $1,100 per year, plus the special bonus.

Miss Nellie Wilding, chief of the stamp-perforating section at a salary of $2,000 per year at the time of her dismissal, has been placed in the loans and currency section of the Treasury Department at a salary of $1,100 per year, plus the special bonus. She had been in the service for more than 24 years.

The three women each applied for restoration of their civil-service rights. Each case was sent to the President, and he "offered no objection in any of the cases," according to explanations made yesterday. No presidential order was issued in any of these instances, it was said.

Ralph H. Chappell, who was drawing $3,250 per year as a section chief, is now under consideration for appointment in another bureau at a salary of around $2,200 per year, it was said at the Treasury Department.

Coming on the heels of an announcement made two weeks ago by Director Louis A. Hill of the bureau that the double investigation made by the Department of Justice and by the Treasury Department revealed no shortage of any kind in the bureau accounts, the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury, which are appended to the Treasury investigators' report, are taken as a vindication of the director, James L. Wilmeth.

Those who were dismissed last year and who have not so far been given back their civil-service ratings are: B. R. Stickney, E. H. Ashworth, Adam P. Ruth, J. J. Fisher, P. J. Farrell, James A. Chamberlain, George Jacobs, H. H. Ashworth, Frank Campbell, Ralph H. Chapell, George C. Cole, F. J. Crocker, William C. Deane, J. J. Deviny, George P. Jackson, John T. Howard, Thomas F. Roche, Frank W. Lerner, William C. McKinney, George V. Rose, Thomas F. Slattery, A. C. Steinbrenner, B. R. Stickney, Jesse E. Swigert, H. I. Wilson, Benjamin Goldsworthy, and G. F. C. Smilla.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, all now know that the removal of the heads of the bureaus in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing was merely the beginning of a wholesale removal of civil-service employees for the purpose of supplanting them by active Republican politicians, regardless of what effect it might have upon the efficiency of the bureau. Had not the public reacted so violently to this outrageous act, it was to have been, as I am informed, repeated in all the departments. A word was coined, and much used, and came from some one close to the administration, that "they" were going to "Hardingize" the administration. After the investigation of the Attorney General, with all his love (?) for law and order and justice, for which he is so famous (?), and after all the activities of the Treasury Department in order to find some reason to justify the President for this hasty and unlawful action, it now becomes apparent that there was no justification for the removal of these people, and a recommendation is upon the desk of the President of the United States asking him to issue an order, which it is necessary that he shall do, revoking his former order striking down the reputation of these men and women and restoring them to the eligible list, so that they may be eligible to reemployment in the Government service.

As the article says, it comes too late for one. Doctor Beech, for 30 years a faithful servant of the Government, died of a broken heart, so his son says, because of the injustice done him by this wrongful removal. Three women, who through all the years have toiled up under the disadvantages that formerly beset women in Government employment and the discriminations that were practiced against them, had reached responsible positions with comfortable if not adequate salaries. Their good name, their right to earn an honest living, was stricken down by this order of the President of March 31, 1922.

Since then the President, ashamed of that act, has issued an order permitting these three women to go back into the Government employ, but at just half their former salaries. He gave to the henchmen of the administration their old places and permitted these women to creep back into the service at salaries where people who are just entering the public service are starting. Twenty-five and thirty years of faithful service and promotion were wiped out merely to give the places to some active Republican.

I called attention the other day to, and I intend to repeat, something of the character of these men.

Hill, the man who was put at the head of the bureau in the place then filled by Mr. Wilmeth, was being sued by his wife on charges that I should not care to rehearse. Shortly after he got his place his wife had to go into court and restrain him from throwing her and her children and her furniture in the streets to make room for somebody else.

McCully, who took the place of Mr. Ashburton as the chief of the bureau of rolls, dies, and plates, was being sued by his wife, and among the exhibits was a letter that he had written to a 15-year-old girl in the District of Columbia asking her to call upon a certain doctor, to whom he would direct her, and would pay whatever expenses were involved. Of course, everybody knows what the necessity of her going to the doctor was. That sort of a man was given the place of a man by the name of Ashburton, who, at 4 o'clock on the day he was dismissed, was given a letter by the committee that investigated his department commending him for his efficiency, his faithful discharge of his duties, and his intelligent administration of his bureau. At 6 o'clock he was dismissed "for the good of the service," so the order said. These men and women were not even permitted to go to their desks to get their private effects except under the custody of a detective. They could not remove their hats from the pegs where they had hung them without being shadowed. The detectives went to their homes and required their families to give the numbers of the Liberty bonds they had bought, to cast suspicion upon them. One woman came to my office this morning and said that she was hooted by other employees when she left the service, and later was told that if she made any complaint they would bring people to show that she was a common streetwalker, though the mother of three helpless children, making a decent living for them, and nobody had ever reflected on her good name before.

I say the President ought to issue this order. It ought to be the first thing he does, and in doing it he ought to go further; he ought to put the people back in the places from whence they came. If, as it is said, it will disarrange the present bureau, the fact is that the other shakeup disarranged it, and justice ought to be done under the Government if the heavens fall. The humblest man or woman that walks the earth ought not to feel that his Government will not do him exact justice. If he shall have reason to doubt that the Government is going to deal justly with him, of course it ends all effective appeal to his loyalty. It breeds disloyalty. No government is worth defending that is not just. All should know that no one, simply because he is temporarily in high place, may strike him down without redress.

It is said that a king of France, leading his army on the eve of battle, was appealed to by some peasant to redress a wrong that he had suffered at the hands of a military commander. The king halted the march of his army until he could right the wrong of the humble peasant. The President of these United States ought to be as big a man and as just a man as the king of feudal France, and I am going to say this: I do not believe the President would have done this if he had been properly advised. It was some overzealous partisan who was seeking places for friends who advised the President to do this. He has not time to go into all those matters, and I am sure that had he been properly advised he would not have done it. But now, knowing that he has been imposed upon, he ought to right the wrong, whatever the inconvenience may be. The people of this country will be sorely disappointed in the President of these United States, it now being admitted, as it is said here it is, coming from the White House, that these people were done a wrong, if he does not right it. All the glories of his administration must necessarily pale and tarnish if he does not so act in this matter that all will know that he is just enough to do justice; and he can not do justice, if this article is correct, unless he issues an order restoring these people to their eligibility and putting them back in the places from whence they were so unjustly taken.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LENROOT in the chair). Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CARAWAY. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KING. For information I should like to ask the Senator, was there authority for the President of the United States to oust these people from office in a way which, on the record, seems to have been unwarranted and unjust?

Mr. CARAWAY. There was no authority. Three of them were ex-service men who were protected by a special statute; but the Senator from Utah will remember that when I called attention to that fact and introduced a resolution to have it investigated the chairman of the Committee on Civil Service opposed it and had it sent to his committee, and everybody knew what would happen to it in that committee.

It was just as certain there to go to its death as the fly in the famous story we used to have in the readers—

Walk into my parlor, said the spider to the fly;
It's the prettiest little parlor that ever you did spy.

The great friends of civil service in the Senate seem to be very much more the friends of the arbitrary power of the party that can promote and demote.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me, is there nothing that can be done by Congress to right the wrong that has been done to these faithful men and women who were in the Government service for so many years?

Mr. CARAWAY. Can an act of Congress go down into the muddy grave that holds the body of Doctor Beach and resurrect him and restore to him life and faculty to comprehend that justice is being done to his memory?

Mr. KING. No; of course, that is obvious. But it does seem to me that Congress ought to make such an investigation as will focus attention upon this great wrong—indeed, almost a crime—and hold up to the public those who are responsible for the grave injustice and the tragic consequences to which the Senator has referred.

Mr. CARAWAY. I wish the Senator from Utah would introduce a resolution asking for an investigation. The facts are now developed as to all the probings of the sleuths and detectives who wove themselves around these people's lives, trying to find out something they had done to justify the President for their removal. The paper says, and I take it that it speaks the truth, that information comes from the White House now that these probes have shown that the removals were without any justification at all. Congress could, of course, do them financial justice.

Nothing can recompense them for the humiliation and for the loss of reputation and good standing among the people where they have spent their lives. No act of Congress can remove the sense of injustice, which will stay with them all their lives, which they feel when they reflect that after years of faithful service they should be dismissed merely to make places for politicians, but with the stigma that it was done "for the public good." If they had been kicked out for the real reason that led to their removal—that is, to make places for politicians thought to be more actively supporting the administration—that would not have carried with it disgrace, but the infamy of it was that their removal was said to be for the good of the service, which implied and was interpreted everywhere as meaning that they were guilty of wrongdoing. We all know a propaganda went around the city that they had committed all kinds of outrageous crimes. A Republican Senator took me out into the corridor and told me I was fixing to be tremendously humiliated, that he was assured by people who knew that their speculations were frightful, and if it should become known it would almost destroy the credit of the Treasury, whatever that might be; and he believed it. He was certain of it, because he had been told. That was the infamous propaganda that went forth to destroy these people's reputations.

If the Senator will permit, I particularly complain of the dismissal of three women, who toiled there 25 or 30 years, through all the adverse circumstances that the Senator knows used to surround a woman in Government employ, discriminated against in favor of men who were more active politically, but who, by the sheer worth of character and intelligence and faithful employment, had risen until they were the heads of bureaus, only to find themselves removed "for the public good" and private detectives sent with them to get their little personal effects. Then, finally, by an Executive order, permitted to go back to work at just half their former salaries. Nothing can wipe out the infamy of that conduct. Nothing ever can be done that can compensate those poor people for the humiliation and the heartaches they have suffered through all these months they have labored under this stigma. I only hope the President will be as ready to issue an Executive order removing from their fair names the infamy placed upon them. When he has done that I suppose that will be as much as we may expect him to do, because the politicians have the places.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, when we were considering an appropriation bill a few days ago, there was some discussion concerning the Civil Service Commission and the administration of the civil service law. Criticism was voiced concerning the method in which the law was enforced, and views expressed that provisions of the law were being violated. Since I have been in the Senate, Senators have frequently called attention to what they considered were evasions of the law and flagrant infractions of both its letter and spirit. Undoubtedly a majority of Senators and Representatives are in favor of the civil-service system, but there are those among this class who are so dissatisfied with the administration of the law that they feel that perhaps a return to what is called the spoils system would produce no greater evils than those found under the unsatisfactory administration of the civil service law.

I have said upon a number of occasions that the law, as administered, was a farce and that the evils existing in the executive departments of the Government prior to the passage of the civil service law were perhaps no greater than those found in the executive branches of the Government to-day. I have felt that the civil service law in too many instances was used as a shield to protect incompetents and political favorites and that the law had so many loopholes and that its administration was accompanied by so much partisanship and incompetency that the benefits to be expected from an honest civil service law, honestly and fairly administered, were not realized.

There is no doubt that politicians in both political parties have attempted to use the law to protect incompetent officials and to secure positions for individuals purely because of political reasons. Within the executive departments of the Government can be found thousands of competent and efficient men and women. They earnestly and patriotically devote themselves to the discharge of duties required under the law. Many of them came into the service without having taken a civil-service examination. Some were blanketed into the service, and others entered the Government service before the civil service law was enacted. Still others, entrenched behind the civil-service ramparts, are wholly incompetent and are indifferent to their obligations and to the welfare of the Government.

This class do as little as they can, and they are indifferent and inefficient and compel the employment of a larger force than otherwise would be required. It is, I think, conceded that employees of the Government, in the aggregate, do much less than employees doing the same character of work in private life. The faithful and efficient employees of the Government are compelled to suffer because of the incompetent and inefficient ones. The faithful suffer because of the faithlessness of the others.

Perhaps an important reason for the failure of the civil-service system, as it is administered in the United States, is found in the fact that many of the heads of Federal agencies seek to use their positions to induct into office individuals of their political faith. To accomplish this end the civil service law and the regulations promulgated to bring about its administration are evaded and oftentimes contemptuously disregarded. Faithful and competent employees whom they find discharging with fidelity the duties imposed upon them are demoted or assigned to other positions or transferred to less favorable stations or subjected to such embarrassments and humiliations as to compel their resignations. I believe the failure of the civil-service system is largely due to the animosity exhibited by those having executive authority. When a change of administration comes changes are made in the more important positions of the departments and of Federal and executive agencies. Those who come in with the new administration in many instances seek positions for their political protégés or for those who are indorsed by politicians of their party.

I think it may truthfully be said that under both Republican and Democratic administrations many individuals who are under civil service, and who are faithfully performing their duties, are improperly and in many instances unjustly dealt with by chiefs of bureaus and those who are placed in authority over them. In many instances, as I have indicated, they are changed or moved or transferred and their places filled by others who have the indorsement of persons of influence in the party in power. I do not think there is any particular loyalty to the civil-service system upon the part of many of those within the Government service whose duty it is to enforce the law, both in letter and spirit; and, as I have indicated, there are many persons holding inferior and subordinate positions who feel that they are entrenched for life, who in an apathetic and indifferent way perform the work assigned them.

I have heard much criticism of the Civil Service Commission and the methods employed by it in its examinations and in the methods employed in its ratings. I confess that I have been disappointed in some of its activities. I think, generally speaking, the civil service commissioners have been men of character and ability, and they have sought to build up a genuine civil-service system. I have, however, been compelled to take the view that some holding less important positions in the civil service administration have been partisan and have used their positions to advance the interests of applicants for Federal positions who belong to their political faith. Nor have I been satisfied with the methods employed to determine the competency of applicants for positions under the civil service. I believe that under the system employed injustices have been done and the least efficient have often been certified as eligible for appointment.

Mr. President, the civil-service system has been on trial for a number of years and it has not satisfied the people. I do not mean to say that the people would vote for the repeal of the law, but I am convinced that a majority of the American people are not satisfied with the law or with its administration. They are unable to determine where the fault lies. Some attribute it solely to the Civil Service Commission; others solely to executive departments and those charged with administering it. Without expressing any opinion as to where the fault lies, I am satisfied that there must be material changes either in the law or in its enforcement, or there will be a demand, formidable in character, for the sweeping away of the Civil Service Commission and the entire system.

I think the time has come when those who believe in genuine civil service should address themselves to the purification of the system and the rectification of faults which are now apparent. I am not prepared to say that the Civil Service Commission should be abolished, but I do take the position that we must have an honest and genuine civil service or none at all. To have a sham and farcical system can not be tolerated. The law must be amended and its administration must be materially changed if the results which honest civil-service reformers desire are accomplished.

The method adopted by the President in selecting postmasters is calculated to bring the civil-service system into still greater disrepute. Examples of the character just referred to by the Senator from Arkansas will arouse indignation and lead to vehement demands for the abolition of the entire system or for drastic reforms. Unless reforms are effectuated,

I shall not be willing to support these annual appropriations for the Civil Service Commission. I am willing to vote the necessary sums to inaugurate and perpetuate a civil-service system that will promote efficiency and advance the interests of the Government.

The President of the United States, if we are to believe the statements made by the Senator from Arkansas, has done a grievous wrong to a large number of faithful Government employees. Some one has imposed upon the President and he has used his authority in such a manner as to do irreparable wrong and injury to the persons referred to.

Mr. President, this is not the only instance of an abuse of the law. In my opinion, there are hundreds of cases where competent employees have been removed or demoted because of political reasons. Complaints have been made to me of flagrant violations of the civil service law by the Treasury Department under the present administration. In the Internal Revenue Department I am advised that many injustices have been done and the letter and the spirit of the civil service law have been disregarded.

Mr. President, let us not be insincere and hypocritical. Let us have a civil service law and enforce it—one that will meet the highest demands of a progressive people and a progressive Government or abolish it entirely and say to the political party in power "the offices belong to the victor."

Mr. President, a friend of mine who is a man of high character and great ability handed me an article which he prepared which deals with the civil-service question. There is so much of merit in the article that I feel like bringing it to the attention of the Senate by asking that it be placed in the RECORD, whereby it may secure wide circulation and proper publicity.

There has recently been considerable controversy over the enforcement of the prohibition law and the efforts which it is alleged are being made to pervert the law and the spirit of the law by placing within the civil service the great army of employees who are engaged in enforcing the Volstead Act. Of course, everybody knows that many of those who have been employed by the Treasury Department in the enforcement of this act have been corrupt and inefficient. The evidences daily demonstrate that many of those now in the service are incompetent and corrupt. Certainly the friends of prohibition and the friends of civil service can not support any proposition which looks to the issuance of a blanket order placing the thousands of individuals employed in the prohibition branch of the service under the civil service law. Mr. Dudley Foulke, vice president of the National Civil Service Reform League, has recently had something to say about this matter. His statement appears in the New York Times of the issue of January 8, 1923. I ask that it, as well as the article to which I have referred, be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the articles referred to were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IS CIVIL SERVICE THREATENED?

Civil service has become an almost sacred institution with the American public. There is something so sordid and selfish and wasteful and unbusinesslike about the spoils system of operating Government institutions that it weakens people's respect for service and confidence in the sincerity of those who profess concern in economy and efficiency.

Certain national publications of civil-service organizations are asking the question, "Is civil service threatened?" For the first time in 25 years there seems to be a feeling of apprehension, not only on the part of Government employees but on the part of the general public, 95 per cent of which is not concerned with the political complexion of employees.

While there is no danger of the law being repealed, there have been a number of occurrences during the past year and a half, according to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, which seem to justify the misgivings of everyone except that class which might be barred from appointment on the ground of "pernicious political activity."

The system seems to have taken on a new aspect and character during the past year. Once seriously considered and highly respected, it has become an ambushade for its opponents to work behind.

It is true that President Harding issued a proclamation putting all postmasters in civil service, as had President Wilson four years before. But the order of March 31, 1917, placed all such positions beyond the reach of partisan influence and control by giving the appointment to the applicant receiving the highest rating in every examination held; under this order President Wilson appointed more Republicans than Democrats in States north of the Mason and Dixon line.

Four years later, at the suggestion of the national chairman of the Republican Party and under the advice of an Attorney General who avowedly does not believe in civil service, President Harding issued his three-pronged order, by which all Democrats or inactive Republicans, no matter how faithful in the discharge of official duties, no matter how popular, experienced, or highly indorsed in their respective communities, are adroitly eliminated. In the selection of postmasters at present, an applicant armed with the indorsement of his local party committee may receive as a reward for political activity a responsible position in which political activity is expressly forbidden.

This is not civil service as expressed by the law, as implied in the Executive order, or as explained by advocates of the system, but it is the civil service of to-day.

The civil-service law provides that the President may issue executive orders perfecting the means of its enforcement or for making it more effective, which is clearly an executive function. But the President may not issue an Executive order which has the effect of repealing an act of Congress or of nullifying its evident purpose. This has been the opinion of the Department of Justice for a half century. In other words, while the President may extend the scope of the civil-service system and is authorized to include in its operation any class of appointees he may designate, he can not legally change the law in its application to employees or officials thus included. That is a question of legislation, and it is doubtful if Congress could, even if it desired, confer on an executive the power to legislate.

When the President issued an order placing all postmasters in the classified service he was acting within his rights. His order became a part of the law, adding another class to those already affected by its restrictions and protection. It was not, on its face, a contradictory or subversive mandate. It merely designated additional positions to which the well-defined and generally recognized provisions of the law should apply.

What is the acknowledged purpose of this law? As indicated by its wording, the intention of its makers was to guarantee equal opportunities to all applicants for appointments to positions classified by legislation or proclamation, regardless of politics or religion, and to protect classified employees of the Government against the whims, bargains, and machinations of superiors who might seek to fulfill personal or political obligations at the expense of public service. If it fall in these essentials, of what avail is the law? If applicants are rejected because they have been identified with one party or another, if they are appointed because of their political affiliations or activities, what does the law amount to, anyhow?

Defenders of the spoils system, which is now masquerading in civil-service garb, compare the practice of selecting appointees from three certified applicants for postmastership, with the established plan of choosing one of the highest three on an eligible list in a post office. If these latter selections were based on partisanship or the recommendations of party organizations, the President and Postmaster General would be shocked and indignant. Any postmaster actuated by such considerations in recommending appointments would be summarily dismissed from office.

According to the provisions of the law and the rules of the commission, "no discrimination shall be exercised, threatened, or promised against or in favor of an applicant, eligible, or employee in the classified service because of his political or religious opinions or affiliations."

"Political discrimination," according to the rules governing the application of the civil service law, "consists in giving appointment, promotion, or any other favor to an appointee, eligible, or candidate because of his politics, or withholding appointment, promotion, or any other favor from an appointee, eligible, or candidate because of his politics."

"An appointing officer who appoints or refuses to appoint an applicant because the applicant does or does not entertain certain political opinions" violates the civil service act and rules. "The removal of a large number of employees of the same political faith" or, conversely, the selection of a large percentage from one political party, will be presumed to have been done for political reasons, according to the rules governing the commission.

Even a President of this Republic should not hold himself above the law and rely upon the numerical strength of political backing to validate his disregard of Federal statutes. There is little difference between the pernicious claim that "the king can do no wrong" and the equally pernicious doctrine that "the President may ignore a law which he expects others to observe."

Section 6 of the civil service act provides that "no person in the classified civil service of the United States shall be removed therefrom except for such cause as will promote the efficiency of said service, and for reasons given in writing, and the person whose removal is sought shall have notice of the same and of any charges preferred against him and be furnished with a copy thereof, and also be allowed a reasonable time for answering." President Harding has ignored the law in both appointments and removals. He has commissioned postmasters in violation of his own Executive order, as well as of the law, and has removed faithful employees in the classified service against whom no charges had been preferred and to whom no hearing was accorded. All of which goes to prove that while the law may not be repealed or the system abolished, one has become a travesty and the other a farce.

At the beginning of the present administration there were many promises made to carry out the civil-service policy inherited from the previous administration. Postmaster General Hays, in his first official statement, declared himself in favor of the merit method, against the spoils system. Later, in his annual report of 1921, he designated the Post Office Department as a purely business institution, which should be removed entirely and immediately from political control. He said: "You can not expect men and women to give good service if they are to be the shuttlecocks of politics. I have said, and I reiterate, that the postal establishment is most certainly not an institution for politics nor for profit, but an institution for service."

And he further declared that the first step in postal improvement "is to make certain that honest and efficient service shall be honestly recognized and that the merit system shall control without any subterfuge under any circumstances whatever."

That was the promise but it is necessary to consider the fulfillment to ascertain the sincerity of those who administer the law. While this theory was expounded by the Postmaster General, by and with the advice, consent, and knowledge of the President, let us look at the practice. As explained by a Senator from the President's home State and in his confidence, on page 6783 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for 1922, it is this: "We have asked the successful candidate (for postmaster) to secure the indorsement of the Republican county committee, which is the body upon which the party must depend for its work back home."

Apologists for the policy of applying political tests to applicants for positions placed in civil service by President Harding's Executive order say that "it is hard to say how far the merit rule should go." The answer should be easy to any honest, oath-bound, law-abiding official. The rule should apply to those who are classified by law or Executive order. If certain positions are to be considered political, they should not be included with those who are entitled to protection of this law.

The proper extension of civil service was discussed by the First Assistant Postmaster General, Hon. John H. Bartlett, when he was president of the Civil Service Commission. He said: "The classified service should be extended to include positions, with few exceptions, which do not involve the determination of administrative policies and which are part of the permanent operating force of the Government, thereby making them available as rewards for exceptional talent developed within the service, and also utilizing valuable experience in the lower grades. The exclusion of the administrative offices of real distinction and comfortable compensation from the legitimate ambition of employees operate not merely against careers in the service but against the appointment to positions of high responsibilities of the very person best qualified to fill them because of their training and experience. Heads of bureaus and local offices are appointed from the outside without expert knowledge and rarely serve more than two or three years, when they give place to others equally inexperienced. A wider application of the principle of filling the higher administrative positions by a system of promotion or appointment on merit would be distinctly in the interest of efficiency, stability, and standards in the personnel of the service."

That was high ground. But which positions pertain to the transaction of Government business, and which are concerned in the determination of administrative policies? Let Postmaster General Hays answer: "We expect to have political offices largely filled by members of the political party in whom we have voted to intrust the administration of our public affairs. But what are political offices and how far should the principle apply? Wise men will not propose that we carry it into the appointment of Army officers, nor in the appointments to technical or business positions. It is steadily growing in the minds of the public that if we are to have the most efficient Postal Service we must keep it as far as possible out of politics. This should be done." But he expresses a fear that the doctrine will have a long "fight for proficiency against plunder, of service against spoils."

Even the First Assistant Postmaster General has fallen from the high ground he took as president of the Civil Service Commission. Glance back over the sentiments expressed while acting in that capacity and read what he says now in an article printed in a recent issue of the Supervisory Bulletin. Explaining why certain positions should not be included in the operations of civil service law, he says that "an administration must surround itself with men and women whom it can trust, and when I say trust I mean trust with its secrets as well as its funds."

Of course, if an administration has secrets to be kept from the public, and desires postmasters who will transact secret business concerning only the party in power, it would be a serious mistake to let the law interfere. If the success of a faction is to be held above the welfare of the country, if service is to be sacrificed to spoils, and inexperienced officials are to be installed and paid to guard or utilize political secrets, then the President and the Postal Department may feel justified in treating the civil-service system as a farce.

But what about those restrictions against participation by postmasters of every class in political affairs which have been so rigidly enforced for several years? Are rules to be changed so that new appointees may take part in politics, or carry on the secret negotiations to which the First Assistant has alluded. If they are not to be changed, what is the object in taking energetic party workers and putting them in positions where all manifestations of political energy are expressly forbidden? Is their activity to be muzzled or to be secretly directed and utilized for the benefit of some faction to which they owe their appointments? That policy almost wrecked a party organization back in 1912.

No; the life of civil service is not threatened. But its natural force is abated. The respect once accorded the system is changing to ridicule. Its enemies are its keepers. Spoilsmen wear its colors. The law is becoming a travesty.

In so far as the filling of offices is concerned, involving the payment of public salaries for political services, the harm directly wrought by a prostitution of civil service is not so great as that which arises and spreads and grows from disregard of any law by those to whom its enforcement is intrusted. Contempt for one law breeds and fosters indifference to all laws and the Government and the taxpayers suffer accordingly.

[New York Times, January 8, 1923.]

FOULKE SAYS JOBS PAID FOR DRY LAW—ACCUSES ANTI-SALOON LEAGUE OF BUYING VOLSTEAD ACT WITH FEDERAL PATRONAGE—DENOUNCES ITS METHODS—NOW TRYING TO GET CIVIL SERVICE PROTECTION FOR CORRUPT ORGANIZATION. HE DECLARES—CHARGES "PARTY PLUNDER"—"CONGRESSMEN WANTED IT AND YOU LET THEM HAVE IT," HE SAYS IN LETTER TO NICHOLSON.

The charge that the Anti-Saloon League bought the Volstead Act with Federal patronage and that it was now attempting to put a corrupt prohibition organization under the protection of the civil service laws was made yesterday by William Dudley Foulke, vice president of the National Civil Service Reform League. Mr. Foulke's charge was contained in a letter to S. E. Nicholson, secretary of the Anti-Saloon League.

After Mr. Foulke made an attack on the Anti-Saloon League a short time ago in a speech, Mr. Nicholson wrote to him that neither the Anti-Saloon League nor any other agency at the time the Volstead law was passed "could have got into that law a civil-service provision, and for the league to have forced the issue would have been to jeopardize the passage of the enforcement bill." Mr. Foulke retorted in his letter that a provision exempting the prohibition officers from the civil service law had been inserted in the law and supported by the league.

"The plain fact is that the Congressmen wanted the plunder and you let them have it," wrote Mr. Foulke. "All we wanted was no provision at all and your explanation puts the league in a far worse position than what you say I charged, for you admit that its members, although knowing the Congressmen's views were wrong, yielded to them to get the bill passed. That means that you bought the bill with congressional patronage and paid for it not with your own money but, far worse, with offices paid for out of taxes levied upon the people. I do not at all suppose you understood the immorality of that act, but in any reasonable system of ethics it was far more indefensible than opposing the civil service law."

NO MOVE MADE FOR A CHANGE.

"Your league is not like an ordinary political organization which can compromise and give and take what it will for the sake of expediency, but you are professedly engaged in accomplishing a great moral reform, and this can not be done through immoral means. And even if you could not get your bill through except by excluding appointments from the classified service, you could at least have declared that you were not cooperating with that part of the bill and did not approve of it."

"Even if it were contended that the end justified the means, the league should have done its utmost to have this iniquitous provision removed and appointments placed under civil service rules as soon as possible. Many years have passed since that time. What have you done? We have repeatedly sent our representative to confer with enforcement officers and have drafted a bill providing for the classification and reexamination of all persons in this branch of the service, yet you never lifted a finger to stay the abuses you had created and to substitute a nonpolitical system for the party plunder you had introduced."

"When the Wilson administration closed and the Republicans came into power, and when the maxim 'turn the rascals out' was more deservedly applied to the enforcement bureau than I ever knew it applied before, would not that have been a good time to substitute nonpolitical and competitive tests for the appointment of those who were to succeed the men dismissed? Yet you never budged."

CHARGES OPEN VIOLATIONS.

"I could give you lists by the score of subordinates involved in frauds. Liquor is openly sold in some of the largest New York restaurants and other public places in the country, and statements made as to how much is paid to the inspectors for permission to make these sales. Liquor is imported daily in enormous quantities from the Bahamas, Canada, and elsewhere in violation of the law. The service is corrupted from top to bottom by a set of depraved political officials appointed under the spoils system which you promoted. Even those who seem anxious to enforce the law are so ignorant and inefficient that they make illegal searches and arrests in violation of the fourth amendment to the Constitution, as recently decided by one of our Federal courts."

"I have been for many years in a very small way a contributor to your organization. I believe that national prohibition, if adequately enforced, would be a great benefit to the families of workmen and others who have suffered from the evils of intoxication, but in view of your past course I am entirely through with you and believe that you have brought nothing but discredit upon the cause you support and that some better organization ought to take your place."

Referring to the bill providing that the field service and prohibition agents should be transferred to the classified service without further examination, Mr. Foulke said the bill was supported by the Anti-Saloon League. "That would include in the classified service every derelict whom the bureau now has in its employ," said Mr. Foulke. "No test of their qualifications was to be imposed. If the bureau had a decent, efficient service now, that might do, but with the corrupt gang that now fills the positions this provision would only render more permanent the present abuses."

Mr. Foulke also made public Mr. Nicholson's reply, in which the secretary of the Anti-Saloon League said he could not agree in condemning prohibition enforcement wholesale. "Of course, it is true that congressional and political pressure has kept some people on the pay rolls of the enforcement office who have failed to do their duty and perhaps have been corrupted," said Mr. Nicholson. "The department has made remarkable headway in getting rid of a good many of these people, even in the absence of the civil-service provision."

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, as a Member of Congress I have, in my weak way, always tried to defend the principle of civil service. I have charged several times, the last time just the other day, that both of the great political parties had violated their pledges made to the people in their various platforms when they went into office.

I do not want to sit quietly here and have any intimation go out that my civil-service belief is of a partisan nature. Reference has been made to the silence of those who pretend to believe in civil service. I want to call attention to the fact that when Mr. Wilson was first elected to the Presidency, or some time after that, I called the attention of the Senate to what took place in the Government Printing Office. I charged the Democratic administration with a violation of the spirit as well as the letter of the civil service law, particularly as it applied to the Government Printing Office. I thought I established the fact by direct evidence.

At that time, both before and after the disclosures which I put into the RECORD, I had had consultations with members of the Civil Service Commission, one of whom was a Democrat and one a Republican. What I said was partially, at least, the outcome of conversations I had with members of the commission, who, without regard to politics, had agreed with me that there had been a very flagrant violation of the civil service act. I complained again during President Wilson's administration, while Mr. Burleson was Postmaster General, as it applied to the post office. I did the same thing the other day, and it was not the first time I did it under a Republican administration, when I charged that the Republican administration was not, in my judgment, carrying out the spirit of the civil service law.

We will not get very far in defending the civil service law unless we shall be just as anxious to expose the violation of the spirit of that act when our party is in power as we would be when the opposite party is in power. I said the other day that in the filling of the post offices I believed my own party had gone farther astray than the preceding administration, at least as far as the post offices were concerned.

I have listened to what the Senator from Arkansas has said and what the Senator from Utah has said about what has happened in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. I was very much shocked when the Executive order was originally made, and it seemed to me that order could not have been made and would not have been made by any sane man unless there was some reason to back it up.

I know that the Senator tells the truth when he says that there was a rumor afloat, more or less certain, that some wonderful disclosures of corruption were going to take place and that the President, to head off a very bad condition of affairs, had removed all these officials in the Bureau of Printing and Engraving and put in others. No other condition would have justified the order of the President.

I concede that the President ought to have issued the order if he was satisfied, upon investigation, that the things that were rumored to be going on were in reality taking place in that bureau. We were given to understand, for instance, by various rumors, that it would be disclosed later that these officials who were removed had been guilty of all kinds of indiscretions and even crimes.

One rumor that persisted, and was repeated over and over, was that a great many Liberty bonds had been issued illegally from the bureau and were in circulation. All Senators have heard those reports. I was one who believed that the President would not issue the order unless he at least conscientiously believed that there was some foundation for it, and I am not willing yet to give up that theory.

Mr. ASHURST rose.

Mr. NORRIS. I will yield to the Senator in just a moment. I was shocked when the order came, because I believed, without having any knowledge of it except my belief that no official would issue such an order without foundation for it, that without doubt investigation would disclose that the order was rightfully issued. It appears now that the order was not rightfully issued, that the charges made against the discharged civil-service people was unfounded; and, at least so far as I am able to see now, that is the fact. The article which the Senator from Arkansas read is undoubtedly one which came from administration sources, and discloses that fact. That has been only a few days ago. The President has not had time probably to realize just what a mistake has been made. I believe with the Senator from Arkansas that he must have been very badly advised. Of course he could not make a personal investigation, but he believed he was justified in issuing the order. We ought to give the President sufficient time, it seems to me, after the facts are disclosed, to enable him to rectify the wrong.

I yield now to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator from Nebraska stated that one of the reasons given for the discharge of the employees in the civil service was the rumor at that time that there had been issued a duplication of Liberty bonds.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. ASHURST. Within four or five days after the order was issued dismissing those employees I called upon what in common parlance we term the Secret Service, but which in law is the Bureau of Investigation, and was assured that the idea of an issuance of duplicate or illegal or fraudulent Liberty bonds was absurd; that no Liberty bonds had been duplicated; that it was impossible to make an approach toward issuing spurious Liberty bonds; that not only were the individual finished bonds duly accounted for, but that even every square inch of the paper upon which a bond could be printed was so guarded and accounted for by a series of locks, keys, and combinations and inspections that it would be beyond the range of possibility for the Bureau of Printing and Engraving to print and issue spurious or unauthorized Liberty bonds.

Mr. NORRIS. I have made no investigation myself. I am glad to get the contribution of the Senator from Arizona. But I still feel and I have felt all the time that even though the President were wrong he acted from a good motive. I dislike very much to cast an aspersion upon Government officials. Why, Senators, does any one realize the seriousness of the aspersion which, indirectly at least, through all these rumors was cast upon these employees of the Government? A crime that is abhorrent almost must have been committed if the rumors were true. I can well see how faithful, honest men, like the one who it is said died of a broken heart, would feel as though all of the ideals of life had passed away, and that he would even lose his mind or that he would die as a result of the cruelty which must have come upon him if in fact he was innocent.

I can not conceive of much lower degradation to which a human being could be put than to utilize a false charge against a fellow citizen, which, if true, would be a crime of the worst nature, for the simple purpose of getting that person out of office and getting himself in. If that kind of trick has been accomplished through the President being wrongly advised, the President will not make it right by simply restoring these people to their rights, but it will be his patriotic duty to punish to the utmost those who have been guilty of practicing that kind of a fraud upon him. If anyone, through that sort of method, has succeeded in getting his name upon the pay roll of the Government of the United States, it ought to be removed immediately.

I take it that the suggestion contained in the article which the Senator from Arkansas has read, even if carried out according to its intent, would not be a full compensation for the persons who have been removed. It would still be an injustice when it is ascertained that the charges were wrongfully made and that the people who were removed by the order were in fact honest and efficient, because it would not put them back where they ought to be to simply put them back on the eligible list and let them begin again at the foot of the ladder, where some of them commenced 20 or 25 or 30 years ago.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator? Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. CARAWAY. The issuing of an Executive order restoring the eligibility of three ladies who were dismissed is an admission that they were entitled to exoneration, is it not?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; it would seem that way to me.

Mr. CARAWAY. Then justice has not been done in that way when they are merely put back to work.

Mr. NORRIS. No; justice has not been done to them. If we are going to proceed in that way, it would still leave the way open to discharge officials of the Government when they had by good service mounted the ladder and occupied positions of responsibility and increased salaries. It would be no full justice if we said to them, "We are mistaken. You are honest. You are all right. We will put you back at the foot of the ladder, where you can start again." That would not be fair. That would be going some distance toward justice, but it would not be all the Government of the United States ought to do with any of its officials.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. DIAL. I would say to the Senator that in my State there was a postmaster who had been in the service 39 years and who stood highest in the examinations, and yet he was not appointed, but a man who had no experience whatever was appointed in his place.

Mr. NORRIS. While there may be some reason not apparent why that was done, it does not approach the thing we are considering here. A postmaster is appointed for a specific term; and there are many who believe, no matter how efficient he may be, that he should retire at the end of the term if another party is in power. I do not agree with that, but a lot of honest men believe in it.

But here is a different proposition. These men and women were actually under civil service. They were removed by an arbitrary order, without trial and without a hearing. That is sometimes necessary, but after it is done they ought to have a hearing immediately. If they have been wronged, they ought to be put back in the identical place from which they were removed.

I do not know how long the knowledge has existed which is published in the paper. It was in the paper of January 23, only yesterday; and I can not help believing yet that if it is a correct statement of the situation—and I take it that it is—the President will do ample justice to the people who have been removed, because I can not get away from the idea that he has been deceived by somebody. If he does full justice, he will not only restore these people to their places but will punish those who have been guilty of practicing the imposition upon him.

I will say to the Senator from Arkansas that if this is not done, I will join with him any time in seeking a full and complete investigation in any honest, fair way. If he has a resolution now slumbering in the pigeonholes of a committee, and will make a motion to discharge the committee, I would be glad to do what little I could to help him either have the committee report the resolution or have the committee discharged and the resolution put on the calendar.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator again?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. CARAWAY. I certainly appreciate the Senator's statement, and I know he will do it. If the President, then, does not quickly act, I shall invoke the aid of the Senator in getting some kind of action.

Mr. NORRIS. I honestly think, I will say to the Senator, that the matter ought not to be permitted to stop where it is. It seems to me on the face of it now that an injustice has been done of a very serious and grievous nature. If these people were guilty, then the public ought to know it and everybody ought to know it. If they were not guilty, as appears from the article that they are not, and some of them have already been reinstated in a lower grade, then the public ought to know just exactly how and why the wrong came about.

Mr. CARAWAY. That is what I particularly wanted to appeal to the Senator's high sense of honor about, that if the women who were removed were not guilty, because an order has been issued to restore them to the eligible list and to put them to work at very much reduced pay, they ought to have a forum where they can go, together with the rest of the employees involved, and vindicate themselves. There ought to be some power somewhere to put them back from whence they came.

Mr. NORRIS. Under the civil service law, as I understand it, where the head of a department—though in this case it is beyond the head of the department, because the President removed them—removes some one and thinks it is necessary to remove them arbitrarily and at once without investigation, then after it is done it becomes the duty of the official to make an investigation. I can see how it would be true in this case if these people were guilty of any of the things that rumor said they were guilty of, that they ought to have been removed instantly.

Mr. CARAWAY. And arrested.

Mr. NORRIS. But there ought to have been immediately an investigation made to disclose whether or not there was anything wrong about the removal. In other words, they ought to have been given an opportunity to be heard. One of the fundamental principles of American jurisprudence is that no man shall be convicted without he has an opportunity to appear in his own defense and face the witnesses against him and have a proper investigation made. That right ought to be accorded to every one of these people. If the President has been imposed upon, as I am inclined to think he has been, he ought to take the lead in seeing that they are vindicated and that those who were guilty of the imposition are properly punished.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed consideration of the bill (H. R. 13660) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment striking out lines 23 and 24, on page 91, is agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the subhead "Buildings and grounds," on page 92, after line 18, to strike out:

Mr. PHIPPS. I suggest that the three paragraphs following should be considered as one amendment with that just stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, it will be so considered.

The READING CLERK. It is also proposed to insert the following paragraphs as an amendment on page 96, beginning in line 8:

For placing and maintaining special portions of the parks in condition for outdoor sports, $20,000.

For operation, care, repair, and maintenance of the pumps which operate the three fountains on the Union Station Plaza, $4,000.

For purification of waters of the Tidal Basin and care, maintenance, and operation of the bathhouse and beach, $12,000.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I wish again to voice a protest against this method of legislation. For a number of years both the House of Representatives and the Senate have been trying to get away from lump-sum appropriations. I do not believe that there is any poorer way to legislate than by so-called lump-sum appropriations, merely turning a very large sum of money over into the hands of a department and telling them to spend it as best they can, without any restriction or limitation. That is what is proposed to be done here.

It will be noted that in the House provision beginning on page 92 and running down to the bottom of page 95, the uses to which the money is to be appropriated are specifically set out. That character of legislation has been found wise from time to time heretofore, and it certainly ought to be continued. Of course, the Republican majority in the Senate is so large that they will no doubt indorse these lump-sum appropriations as they have been reported by the committee.

I served in the other branch of Congress for a number of years; I know what views were then held there in reference to lump-sum appropriations; and I believe, from the form in which the pending bill came from that body, Members of the House still have the views which they then held in reference to lump-sum appropriations. I sincerely hope that the House conferees will stand up for their views on this subject and will prevent this method of lump-sum appropriations.

I sometimes think it would be better, instead of attempting to impose any limitation, to turn the entire appropriation carried in the bill over into the hands of the District Commissioners and say, "Boys, here are the millions for which you ask; go ahead and do the best you can with the city government." If we should pursue that course, I do not know but that we should have a better city government than under the method we are now pursuing.

Mr. President, if no one else wishes to discuss the matter, I am going to ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment, because I think it involves a principle of such importance that we ought to have a record vote of the Senate in reference to it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, before the Senator from Tennessee asks for the yeas and nays, I should be very glad if the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS] would explain what items in the House bill are comprised within the aggregate appropriation of $348,750 as found on page 96, line 7, and whether any of the remaining amendments which are found on pages 96 and 97 comprise new matter?

Mr. PHIPPS. I will say to the Senator, as stated this morning when the question came up, the item in the last two lines, on page 91, and the items beginning with line 19, on page 92, and running down to the end of page 95, have been consolidated into four paragraphs, beginning at the top of page 96.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me—

Mr. PHIPPS. Yes.

Mr. KING. I notice on page 95 an appropriation of $12,000 for the Tidal Basin Bathing Beach. Is that a different item from the item which is found on page 96 proposing to appropriate $12,000 for the purification of the waters of the Tidal Basin?

Mr. PHIPPS. It is the same item, there being merely a change in the language. It was thought advisable to keep that item separate from the others, and also the items "For placing and maintaining special portions of the parks in condition for outdoor sports," and the item "For operation, care, repair, and maintenance of the pumps which operate the three fountains on the Union Station Plaza." The other items stricken out of the House bill are included in the first paragraph on page 96.

Mr. KING. I should like again to ask the Senator from Colorado whether the total of $348,750 is less or more than the aggregate of the other items to which he has referred?

Mr. PHIPPS. It is $12,000 more. In the item approved by the House in the language stricken out on page 94, lines 1 to 6, we allowed the Budget estimate of $50,000, instead of $40,000; and in the item on line 21, page 94, we allowed the Budget estimate of $10,000, instead of $8,000. So there is an increase of $12,000 in all in those two items.

Mr. KING. Let me ask the Senator, why did the committee increase the appropriation of $40,000, which is found on page 94, line 6, of the bill as it came from the other House?

Mr. PHIPPS. Because it was the judgment of the subcommittee and of the full Appropriations Committee that the amount allowed for the various items, including office rent, maintenance, and so forth, of various reservations throughout the city was inadequate. As the Senator from Utah knows, there are over 600 such reservations, and the appropriation was deemed insufficient to enable them to be properly maintained. The committee thought that the judgment of the Budget Bureau that the amount should be $50,000 was correct, and that the action of the House in paring that appropriation down to $40,000 was not in line with our view of what should be allowed for the work.

Mr. KING. How does the Senator differentiate a reservation from a park? He says there are a large number of reservations, six hundred odd—

Mr. PHIPPS. Yes.

Mr. KING. What distinction does the Senator make between reservations and parks?

Mr. PHIPPS. To illustrate, the four blocks in the northeast section comprising Lincoln Park are properly called a park, whereas the triangular spaces created by the intersection of streets running at angles are called reservations; and likewise where circles are formed, such as Scott Circle, Thomas Circle, and Du Pont Circle, those circular spaces are called reservations. The larger areas, of course, are definitely set aside for park purposes.

Mr. KING. Who controls the reservations?

Mr. PHIPPS. These public grounds are under the jurisdiction and supervision of the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds, that position now being held by Colonel Sherrill.

Mr. KING. Do I understand that the reservations and the parks and all of the grounds of the public buildings—for instance, the Agricultural Department and others—are under the jurisdiction of Colonel Sherrill?

Mr. PHIPPS. That is correct; yes.

Mr. KING. And Rock Creek Park?

Mr. PHIPPS. Rock Creek Park is also under his jurisdiction.

Mr. KING. None of these reservations or parks is under the control of the District Commissioners or any agency directed by them?

Mr. PHIPPS. None whatever; they are all under the jurisdiction of Colonel Sherrill at the present time, and he is known in that capacity as the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. KING. Have there been brought under one heading or under one appropriation all of the items that would be involved in caring for public buildings and grounds, including parks and reservations, or are they scattered all through this bill and other bills?

Mr. PHIPPS. The building, for instance, used for administrative purposes for the city government, known as City Hall, is provided for in this bill separately; the building occupied by the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia is likewise provided for by the bill separately; and that is also true of the Municipal Court Building.

Mr. KING. My recollection is that in the independent offices appropriation bill which was passed a few days ago appropriations were carried for the care of some of the public buildings and grounds.

Mr. PHIPPS. That is true; but those were not District of Columbia buildings, but buildings such as those of the Interior Department and other departmental buildings.

As to the Agricultural Department Building, concerning which the Senator spoke, I thought he had reference to the grounds surrounding that building. Of course, for the upkeep of the building, which is the executive office of the Department of Agriculture, provision is made in a different bill, because that has nothing to do really with a District of Columbia activity.

Mr. KING. Then, as I understand the Senator the bill now before us carries appropriations for the maintenance and care of all reservations and all parks, including Rock Creek Park, and all of the grounds of the executive departments or bureaus or agencies, but not for the buildings of those departments?

Mr. PHIPPS. I am advised that provision for the care of the grounds surrounding the Agricultural Department does not come under this bill but under the independent offices appropriation bill, and also provision for Potomac Park and one or two other large reservations and parks.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator—because I have great confidence in his ability, and I know that he has addressed himself to these measures with a fidelity and zeal which merit the compliment and commendation of all—whether he has considered, or the committee have considered, the wisdom and propriety of transferring all these parks and grounds to the custody and care of the District Commissioners and taking them away from military or semimilitary control?

Mr. PHIPPS. They belong to the Government. We could not do that. We could not give the District officials control over this Federal Government property, and, certainly, it would not be proper to put it in any appropriation bill. That would have to come through a legislative bill. It is legislation.

Mr. KING. I appreciate that. It has occurred to me, I will say, that it would be in the interest of economy if the same agencies that care for the streets cared for the public parks and grounds; and that it would make for economy, and perhaps for a more satisfactory result in the beautification and development of these parks, etc., if they were all under one head; if the person or agency that handled the streets and the sidewalks controlled the parks and the public grounds. Some time ago I introduced a bill for that purpose, because it did seem to me that this divided responsibility was bound to increase the expenses, and would not secure as good results.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator if the only purpose of the change of the House language is to consolidate those items?

Mr. PHIPPS. Absolutely; yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator point out where in the House amendments occur the words found on lines 2 and 3 of the amendment, "including foremen, gardeners, mechanics, laborers"?

Mr. PHIPPS. Page 91, lines 23 and 24, the first amendment that is taken into account—$31,200 in that item.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will ask the Senator if it is not true that under this amendment the provision, for instance, "For care and improvement of Rock Creek Park and the Piney Branch parkway, $30,000," can be used by the commissioners for that purpose or for any other of the various purposes cited on pages 93, 94, and 95?

Mr. PHIPPS. Yes; that could be done.

Mr. McKELLAR. In other words, instead of limiting to $40,000 the amount "For improvement, care, and maintenance of various reservations, including office rent, the maintenance, repair, exchange, and operation of three motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles to be used only for official purposes, and the operation, maintenance, repair, and exchange of motor cycles and bicycles for division foremen," they would have the right to appropriate any amount within the $343,750 for that purpose?

Mr. PHIPPS. That is correct.

Mr. McKELLAR. And, for instance, instead of improving and caring for and maintaining the Smithsonian grounds by expending $4,000 on them, as provided by the House measure, they would have the right not to spend a cent on those grounds? In other words, it is just left to their discretion?

Mr. PHIPPS. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will take another one:

For care and improvement of East Potomac Park, $35,000.

That is a very worthy appropriation, and it is very proper that the Congress should determine that that park should be improved; but under the Senator's amendment the commissioners would have a perfect right to spend that $35,000 for passenger-carrying vehicles, if they saw fit, or for any other purpose they desired?

Mr. PHIPPS. There they would not have that right. That is to say, they could spend it for the maintenance or upkeep of them, yes; but not for the purchase of them.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator knows that they can switch them around and have as many as they want.

I call attention to another thing:

For placing and maintaining special portions of the parks in condition for outdoor sports, $20,000.

By the way, it provides there that it shall be "payable wholly out of the revenues of the District of Columbia"; but that will not be provided for, and that will be changing the matter entirely, will it not?

Mr. PHIPPS. It would; and that point came up for discussion yesterday afternoon in connection with another item, at which time I called attention to the fact that, all told, the five or six activities which have been charged entirely to the District of Columbia the Senate committee feels should now go on the 60-40 basis, the same as other expenditures, and stated the reasons for that opinion.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; but we are changing law when we strike that out. We are changing the provisions of law, and I think it is really subject to a point of order, strictly speaking.

Mr. PHIPPS. I should have to take issue with the Senator on that statement.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator may be right about it, because I do not know whether I am right about parliamentary law or not. I never make an assertion about it, or at least I never make it without the reservation that I may be wrong about it. I am not sufficiently familiar with it to be accurate in my statement about it. However, here is an item reading:

To provide for the increased cost in park maintenance, $50,000.

The commissioners can spend it for that or they can spend it for any of the other purposes mentioned herein and not spend a cent for that. Is not that true? How does that make for good legislation?

Mr. PHIPPS. They could, but we know they are not going to do that.

Mr. McKELLAR. Why not just turn over to them the lump sum and tell them to do the best they can with it? Why put any limitations on it if you do not put on a reasonable limitation? The Senator and his committee constantly rely on the Budget. Did the Budget recommend that these amounts be put in lump sums and not itemized? Did not the Budget itemize them? When the Budget recommended them, did they not recommend them as items?

Mr. PHIPPS. The Budget recommended them as items.

Mr. McKELLAR. Then the committee is going beyond its recommendation in consolidating them?

Mr. PHIPPS. The dictum of the Budget is not conclusive on the United States Senate.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, of course, it is not; and that is just what I have been urging for some time. I did not think you gentlemen intended to stand by it when you passed the Budget law; and most of the time now you refer to the Budget, not for the purpose of cutting down the expenditures but for the purpose of giving an excuse for increasing expenditures. I called the Senator's attention just a few moments ago to an item that was increased, where the provision for passenger-carrying vehicles and other things was put at $40,000 by the House and increased to $50,000 by the Senate.

Mr. PHIPPS. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. You then referred to the Budget as being your authority for it. You said that the Budget allowed $50,000 instead of $40,000, and you conformed to the Budget. Now, however, when you are asked about consolidating, and asked if the Budget provided for consolidation, you say no, and that you ought not to be bound by the Budget. When are you bound by the Budget and when are you not bound by the Budget?

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I call the Senator's attention to one item that we passed last night, where the Budget approved $40,000 in a school item and the Senate committee made it $25,000 on information that we had.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think for the committee to attack schools in reducing the Budget is a very, very poor point of attack. I want to say that if the Budget were going to be attacked I would never attack it on its appropriations for schools. I doubt very much whether we appropriate enough for schools. If the committee made the recommendation reducing the amount from $40,000 to $25,000 I think the committee made an error, and I would not support the committee in that contention.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I have sat in committee with the Senator, and he knows the method of procedure. That regarding this bill is similar to that regarding the Post Office bill. The Senate committee obtains independent information for itself, supplementing information collected by the House committee and information obtained by the Budget. To say that we are criticizing the Budget because we change an item, and do not accept its findings, is not justifiable. That is not necessarily a criticism of the Budget. The Budget is useful as a guide, and has been efficient, and has enabled us to effect economies and make savings; but it does not take the place of the work that is performed in the committees of the Senate.

Mr. McKELLAR. Since the Senator has referred to the method which is pursued by the heads of departments, I will state that under the Budget law the heads of departments are prohibited from coming before committees of Congress and seeking to change the findings of the Budget; and, yet, in all the bills with which I have had anything to do since I have been here we find the heads of departments and officials of departments coming before the committee seeking to change the Budget recommendations whenever those recommendations are thought to be against the department.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. Just one moment. I say that if we are going to have a Budget we ought to stand by it. If we have a prohibition in the Budget law against officials of the departments coming up and undertaking to set aside the findings of the Budget we ought to carry out those provisions and we ought to force the heads of departments and officials of departments to conform to that law. I want to say to you that from my observation this year in appropriation bills, in so far as the Budget is concerned, you are making it a laughingstock and a matter of ridicule; and after this year, if we continue as we have started, we are going to find that nobody, either in the departments or out of the departments, will pay any attention to the Budget. If a budget system were properly carried out and if the Congress were to stand by it it would result in an immense saving to the people of the United States; but, conducted as the present Budget system is being conducted, as soon as a department official finds that some little matter or some big matter connected with the appropriation is not satisfactory to him, if he is allowed to run up to the committee and say, "Oh, the Budget did not give us enough here, and we want more," it means nothing in the world, and we might just as well repeal the Budget law.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. PHIPPS. I asked the Senator to yield a few moments ago for the purpose of making the statement and calling his attention to the fact that in no single instance has any representative of a department or a bureau, during the consideration of this bill, been allowed to ask for more than the Budget had approved. I can say without fear of contradiction that during the consideration of this bill the rule has been absolutely enforced. They are precluded from asking for increases of salaries or increases in the amounts approved by the Budget. The Senator proceeds to set up a straw man and get very much worked up over some supposition when the facts do not exist.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no. We belong to the same committee.

We have seen these officials come in and ask for increases. The Senator recalls it in the case of the post-office subcommittee. I heard a Senator who was a member of the Committee on Appropriations say that they had done it in other subcommittees, and warn our subcommittee against it. The Senator recalls the statement. Of course it is being done; but now I want to ask the Senator by whom was the provision at the top of page 96 prepared?

Mr. PHIPPS. It was prepared by the clerks of the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. McKELLAR. At whose suggestion?

Mr. PHIPPS. It was not at any suggestion other than their own in the interest of efficiency, as I am informed and believe; and it was brought to my attention by them, and not by any official of the District.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I submit that this kind of legislation is improvident. It makes for inefficiency in the control of the Government funds, and I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment of the committee.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the amendment.

Mr. PHIPPS. The item at the foot of page 91, lines 23 and 24, is necessarily involved, and it should be reconsidered. That amendment was approved. Senators will understand that that is included in the present motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment on page 91 was agreed to.

Mr. PHIPPS. That is included in the item now under consideration, and I request that the vote by which that amendment was approved be reconsidered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the reconsideration of the vote by which the amendment at the bottom of page 91 was agreed to? The Chair hears none, and it is reconsidered.

The Secretary will state the pending amendment.

The READING CLERK. Strike out from line 19, page 92, to line 25, page 93, and at the top of page 96 insert:

For improvement and care of public grounds in the District of Columbia, including foremen, gardeners, mechanics, laborers, office rent, maintenance, repair, exchange, and operation of not to exceed three motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles, and the maintenance, repair, exchange, and operation of motor cycles and bicycles for division foremen, $343,750.

For placing and maintaining special portions of the parks in condition for outdoor sports, $20,000.

For operation, care, repair, and maintenance of the pumps which operate the three fountains on the Union Station Plaza, $4,000.

For purification of waters of the Tidal Basin and care, maintenance, and operation of the bathhouse and beach, $12,000.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

So the amendment of the committee was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LADD in the chair). The amendment at the bottom of page 91, which was reconsidered, will be agreed to, without objection.

The next amendment was, on page 96, after line 15, to insert:

For commencing the preparation of designs and estimates for development of the Rock Creek and Potomac Parkway, $4,000.

Mr. KING. I would like to ask the Senator what it is estimated the cost will be for preparing the designs and estimates for the development of the parkway. Four thousand dollars is here appropriated to begin with. I can not conceive how it can cost that much.

Mr. PHIPPS. The figure of $4,000, I understand, is fixed as one that would cover the whole thing, but when they make the plans they may have to get into topographical work, and it is a question of just how far they would have to go. The plans should be complete as one unit so that as the development work goes along it will be a part of a plan already agreed upon that will be final, and in this way avoid the grading of roads or pathways and changing of grades which might afterwards have to be changed in completing the plan.

I feel confident that there is going to be no waste of money in that connection. The big thing is, as the Senator realizes, to put in shape the project for connecting up Rock Creek Park and Potomac Park to give a boulevard drive.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator just what territory is embraced within what is called in the item "Potomac Parkway"?

Mr. PHIPPS. Potomac Parkway would extend from the lower or southern end of Rock Creek Park, which would be about Massachusetts Avenue, as I understand it, though it may be nearer Connecticut Avenue or nearer the river, but in about that location, down through the intervening territory and coming out on the Potomac River at a point above the Lincoln Memorial, making a continuous driveway, and locating it as nearly as possible along the Potomac where the land which has already been recovered by the Government would be available for boulevard use, and in connection with the proposed new Arlington memorial bridge and all that development.

Mr. KING. That the project deserves the hearty support of Congress, no one will deny. I commend it very unreservedly. But it seems to me that with the officials already employed and already charged with caring for the parks and with the execution of work heretofore ordered, the appropriation is unnecessary.

Mr. PHIPPS. I will say for the information of the Senator that there is no intention to employ outsiders to prepare the plans. The work would be carried on with employees already in the Government service, but there is no authority of law now to delegate them to do the work. Their salaries from time to time have to be charged to the various items of appropriation. Of course, it involves the use of surveyors in order to get the plans in shape, because they are not merely plans which would give the metes and bounds of the property but plans that would have to take into account the contour of the land itself.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator kindly have read the data that were submitted to the Budget Bureau in support of the item?

Mr. PHIPPS. In the House hearings the item was submitted and the following took place:

Mr. CRAMTON. The next item is:

"For commencing the preparation of designs and estimates for development of the Rock Creek and Potomac Parkway, $4,000."

To what extent has the property been acquired?

Colonel SHERRILL. That property is approximately 70 per cent complete, and it has been under acquisition for about seven years; and it is thought that, since the owners are not able and have not been since this project went through some six or seven years ago, to use the property, knowing this cloud was over it, I feel now is the time to take steps to finish the acquisition by condemnation.

Mr. CRAMTON. And preliminary to that you want to make some definite plans?

Colonel SHERRILL. Yes, sir; and we have not cared to develop any until we shall have bought all the land we can get, but now we will have to go to condemnation.

Mr. CRAMTON. Do you consider this an urgent item?

Colonel SHERRILL. Yes, sir; I put it in last year.

Mr. CRAMTON. What happened to it?

Colonel SHERRILL. Nothing, except, if you see the photographs I have showing the conditions there, I think you would agree that something ought to be done in the immediate future to improve the situation.

Mr. CRAMTON. You mean some land is being developed for other purposes?

Colonel SHERRILL. It is in such a dilapidated condition that we want in the near future to clean it up. [Exhibiting photograph.]

Now, it is to try to get this in shape for Congress to consider that I would like to have money for these plans.

Mr. EVANS. To get exactly what I have in mind, what change, if any, has been made in the paper I have just handed you and which you gave us last year? I am referring principally to the land remaining to be purchased.

Colonel SHERRILL. This figure does not show the percentage, but I can indicate what has been bought in 1922.

Mr. EVANS. It would be what proportion of that unpurchased last year?

Colonel SHERRILL. We have purchased about three-eighths of what we had to purchase last year.

Mr. CRAMTON. It is not three-eighths of the total, but of what remains.

Colonel SHERRILL. Of what remains; yes, sir.

Then we took it up before the Senate committee and had Colonel Sherrill before us.

Mr. KING. Did the Bureau of the Budget recommend the item?

Mr. PHIPPS. It was recommended by the Bureau of the Budget. It was estimated for.

Mr. KING. But not allowed by the House?

Mr. PHIPPS. For some reason it was not allowed by the House.

Mr. McKELLAR. Were all the items on page 96, from line 16 to line 24, recommended by the Budget?

Mr. PHIPPS. Yes; they were.

Mr. McKELLAR. What about those on page 97?

Mr. PHIPPS. That is a reappropriation, as the Senator will notice.

Mr. McKELLAR. I know; but I was wondering whether the Budget recommended it.

Mr. PHIPPS. They recommended it last year.

Mr. McKELLAR. They did not recommend it this year. Will the Senator state why?

Mr. PHIPPS. Because it is permissive. It has been approved as an appropriation. It was in the law of 1923. We desired to continue it and make it available and to allocate it to a certain designated piece of property recommended by the commission.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am not objecting to the item. That is not my purpose.

Mr. PHIPPS. It would not necessarily be submitted to the Budget this year.

Mr. McKELLAR. It ought to have been, because it is an item of appropriation that should have been submitted. I do not see how we can very well deal with it unless it has been submitted. The Senator will recall that it was held by the Appropriations Committee, in connection with the Post Office appropriation bill, that a recommendation by the Budget of last year did not hold good as to this year.

I did not rise for the purpose of opposing the item. I am perfectly willing that it should pass. I think it is a good thing. I merely wanted to call attention to the fact that the Senator's party is paying very little attention to its Budget system.

Mr. PHIPPS. My answer is that the Senate reserves to itself the right to put in any new items that may be just without referring them to the Budget, and the Senate Committee on Appropriations has the authority of recommendation.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; we have a rule about that; unless it is recommended by the Budget it is not in order. I am not going to make the point of order against it, because it is a proposition which I think ought to be in the bill, but I merely call the attention of the Senator again to the fact that in many of the items through all the appropriation bills the Senator's party is paying no attention whatever to the Budget law which was passed some time ago.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 96, after line 18, to insert the following:

For continuing the construction of a sea wall along the water front between the foot of New Hampshire Avenue and the north building line of G Street, including the grading and filling incident thereto, $50,000.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator in charge of the bill whether the evidence before the committee justified so large an appropriation as $50,000?

Mr. PHIPPS. I would say to the Senator that the item is only a very small one in connection with the work that necessarily should be carried on to make available the reclaimed land on the Potomac Flats. This particular sea wall will be erected a little upstream from the end of New York Avenue. It is quite a little distance above the Lincoln Memorial. The particular stretch is along that frontage of which the Government owned only a year or two ago obtained final possession.

The land had been "squatted" on, as the Senator will remember, by certain contractors or people in the contracting business. The Government came into possession of the property later, and owns it in connection with the land in front of it down to low-water mark, which has been reclaimed by filling. Unless the retaining wall be erected within a reasonable length of time the banks will disintegrate and go into the river. Until the sea wall is built the land is not available for the particular purpose for which it has been set aside, to wit, the erection of the so-called Titanic memorial, a statue of bronze valued at some $80,000.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think it is a perfectly proper appropriation and ought to be made, and I congratulate the Senator on having the backing of the merchants in connection with it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 96, after line 22, to insert the following:

For the construction of a comfort station and shelter at Haines Point, East Potomac Park, $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 97, to insert:

The appropriation of $25,000 contained in the District of Columbia appropriation act for the fiscal year 1923 for the construction of a bathing beach and bathhouse for the colored population of the city is continued and made available during the fiscal year 1924 for the construction and maintenance of said bathing beach and bathhouse at the Virginia end of the Key Bridge.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 97, at the end of line 14, to strike out "$24,000" and insert "$37,000," so as to make the paragraph read:

Lighting the public grounds: For lighting the public grounds, watchmen's lodges, offices, and greenhouses at the propagating gardens, including all necessary expenses of installation, maintenance, and repair, $37,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Water service," on page 98, line 18, after the figures "$1,500,000," to insert a colon and the following proviso: "Provided, That the Secretary of War may enter into contracts for materials and work necessary to the construction of said project, to be paid for as appropriations may from time to time be made, not to exceed in the aggregate the sum of $6,150,000, including all appropriations and contract authorizations herein and heretofore made," so as to make the paragraph read:

For continuing work on the project for an increased water supply for the District of Columbia, adopted by Congress in the Army appropriation act for the fiscal year 1922, as modified by the District of Columbia appropriation act for the fiscal year 1923, and for each and every purpose connected therewith, to be immediately available and to remain available until expended, $1,500,000: Provided, That the Secretary of War may enter into contracts for materials and work necessary to the construction of said project, to be paid for as appropriations may from time to time be made, not to exceed in the aggregate the sum of $6,150,000, including all appropriations and contract authorizations herein and heretofore made.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I would like to have the Senator in charge of the bill tell us whether the Budget recommended the item of $6,150,000 and to have him give us the reasons why the committee have recommended it.

Mr. PHIPPS. The law of 1923 carried an item which covered the adoption of a certain project which covers the second conduit from Great Falls, the filtration plant, the connection with the present filter beds, and the general expansion of the water-distribution system, at a cost, as I recall it, of $9,150,000. We appropriated for the year 1923 $1,500,000 toward that work, and authorized additional contracts to the extent of $1,450,000. We now make a direct appropriation of $1,500,000 and authorize them to go to the extent of $6,150,000, including appropriations heretofore and herein made. That gives them the right to enter into contracts up to the amount of $6,150,000, which would leave about $3,000,000 yet to be provided for.

Mr. McKELLAR. What is the purpose of entering into the contract now, if they are doing the work year by year? Why would it not be more economical to do as we have been doing? We all know the prices of labor and material are coming down. Why would it not be more economical to continue the project that we have started? As I understand, last year, according to the Senator's statement, we appropriated $1,500,000 and authorized the entering into contract at $1,400,000 more. Why not put the same limitation this year?

Mr. PHIPPS. That is in round figures what we are doing. That is, we authorized contracting last year to the extent of $3,000,000, in round numbers, and the pending bill carries it up to $6,150,000, so it is a little more than $3,000,000 this year.

Answering the Senator's question further, in entering into a contract for the second conduit, which comes from Great Falls down to the Dalecarlia Reservoir, it would have been unwise and not economical to split the contract. The rock work there is very expensive. The greater part of that work is tunnel work, and not merely trench work that can be dug from the surface and filled in, but it requires blasting in rock for the tunnel on a great portion of that line.

When it comes to contracting for the filtration machinery, which is a very large item, an up-to-date mechanical type of filter will be used. The engineers can not well split that contract, for they have to contract for the filtration machinery as a complete unit.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the filtration machinery be bought before the conduit is built?

Mr. PHIPPS. It will have to be contracted for. I have not any information from the engineers on this particular point as to how long it will take to acquire that machinery after it is ordered, but from information I have as to similar matters—electrical machinery, for instance—I know it is necessary to contract for such machinery from a year to a year and a half in advance in order to secure deliveries and to enable the plans and details to be worked out.

Mr. McKELLAR. At what time is it proposed to finish this project?

Mr. PHIPPS. It was estimated that the work would be completed within four years, and, if possible, within three years, in order to meet the exigencies existing here, where we are right now approaching the limit of the ability of the city to furnish the amount of water which is required by the present population. With a growing population, unless the project can be completed within the next three or four years, a water shortage will be threatened. Even now during the summer months fountains are not permitted to operate all the time, but only permitted at certain hours when there is reserve water available for the purpose.

Mr. McKELLAR. I understand the situation, and I think it is very important that an adequate water supply should be provided; but it seems to me that now to authorize the appropriation of this aggregate sum of $6,150,000 is rather unwise legislation. However, I do not know. If we had had the reasons furnished as to why it should be done, my opinion might be different; but surely we ought not to buy the machinery so far ahead of the time when the conduit will be completed. I should think that the machinery might be bought a great deal cheaper hereafter.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield to me?

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall yield in just a moment. I am not at all familiar with the work, and I merely desire to obtain information about it. I am not sufficiently familiar with the matter to know precisely what should be done.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I will say that this year satisfactory progress has been made under previous authorizations. In making the contracts it has been found that a contractor who has to provide the machinery incurs a certain amount of overhead and other necessary expense in bringing his machinery to the point where it is to be used and then taking it away again; and so, if he only gets a contract for, we will say, a mile of the work, as against 2 miles that have to be done, his bid must be proportionately higher. We can get a lower bid from him if the contract is let for 2 miles at one time.

The day labor in connection with this work does not cut a very great figure in the total amount, as a great deal of the excavation and other work is done by machinery. This year we are only giving authority to contract for the second third of the complete unit. We gave authority last year for the first third of the unit; this year for the second third, and next year we ought to authorize the completion of the work.

As the Senator will recall, the appropriations carried in this bill will run until July 1, 1924. That is quite a long time in the future, but we had to make provision for it in this appropriation bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Colorado whether arrangements have been made with the riparian owners at Great Falls or the point on the river where the water is taken out to relieve the District from damages because of the diminution of the water supply. I recall a number of years ago, when I was in the other House, that a suit was brought against the Government and tried in the Court of Claims or in some other court, and judgment was rendered against the Government for $400,000 or $500,000 for having taken water out of the river. The suit was brought by the riparian owners of the land at Great Falls.

I recall that another conduit was built or that the former one was enlarged—I am not sure which—and that a second suit was brought, claiming $400,000 or $500,000 damages, the contention being that under the law which prevails here, which is the common law, a riparian owner may not be deprived of his water supply, and if water be taken from a stream it must be returned undiminished in quantity and undeteriorated in quality; otherwise the one who takes the water is subject to a suit for damages.

I understand that damages have been paid for the former takings of water from the river. Has arrangement been made with the riparian owners to compensate them for damages, or shall we have another lawsuit upon our hands by further invading the river and taking more of the water from the stream?

Mr. PHIPPS. I will say to the Senator from Utah that by the law of last year provisions covering the acquisition of rights to property were carefully considered, and they were made as broad as possible, conferring all the authority which could be conferred for the taking of the necessary property, providing for court proceedings, and so on.

Mr. KING. Was provision made for the taking of the water or the taking of the land, may I inquire of the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. PHIPPS. In taking the land, as the Senator knows, where it is riparian land, the water would go with it.

Mr. KING. Except as to riparian owners lower down the stream.

Mr. PHIPPS. As the Senator from Utah is aware, there is not any arable land bordering on the Potomac below the point where the water is taken which would be affected by the taking of water at Great Falls.

Mr. KING. But it might be affected for power purposes. I am not sufficiently acquainted with the Potomac to know whether or not the taking of water at that point might possibly interfere with the potential electrical energy at some point lower in the river.

Mr. PHIPPS. I think not.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator if this appropriation is merely to build another conduit?

Mr. PHIPPS. The building of an additional conduit is only a part of the entire scheme. We had last year on the walls of the Senate Chamber, as the Senator will remember, the plans in detail showing where the water was to be taken from the Potomac, the line of the conduit down to the Dalecarlia Reservoir, and the second conduit from that point to the District line, where the additional reservoir and new filtration plant are to be erected, and also the connecting lines to various parts of the city; so that when it is a completed scheme we shall have a dual source of supply. For instance, if one conduit may be out of commission, the other conduit will furnish water up to its full capacity. So in the distributing lines where a line is cut off, which would prevent water going to a distant part of the city with this new installation, if one of those main lines goes out, there will be another line going around another portion of the city and connecting up so as to have what might be called a return current of water.

Mr. KING. I should like to inquire of the Senator whether he has been advised as to the results of a project—whether it was promoted by the District alone or by some of the commercial and civic organizations of the city; I am not advised—for the acquisition of a water supply from some remote portion of the country in Maryland or Pennsylvania, I am not sure which? I remember the matter was discussed here two or three years ago, and it was urged by some engineers that a suitable water supply could be obtained from some of the springs in adjacent mountains which would be very much superior to the present water supply.

Mr. PHIPPS. The Senator refers to the project that was under consideration at the time the Potomac project was considered, and the recommendation on the part of all officials who participated in that investigation was favorable to the Potomac project, which has now been adopted by the Congress, while the project referred to by the Senator from Utah has been discarded. That project might have to be resorted to in later years if the city shall again double its population, but the project which has been approved and is now under way will provide water for a population of over a million.

Mr. KING. I had not learned of the result of the investigation of the project to which I have referred. It seemed to me from what I could learn that it was a very feasible project.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That project was considered before the one which has been adopted was passed upon.

Mr. KING. I was not aware of that fact.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President at this point I desire to offer the amendment which I send to the desk and ask the Secretary to read. I will say that the amendment was included in the bill as reported by the House committee, but went out in the House; I do not know for what reason, but, as I understand, on a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado on behalf of the committee will be stated.

The READING CLERK. In the committee amendment, on page 98, line 24, after the word "made," it is proposed to insert a colon and the following:

Provided further, That no bid in excess of the estimated cost for that portion of the work or plant covered by the bid shall be accepted, nor shall any contract for any portion of the work, material, or equipment to constitute a part of the plant for which this appropriation is available be valid unless the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army shall have certified thereon that all its terms are within the requirements of the authorization and the revised estimates for the work: Provided further, That whenever the Secretary of War causes proceedings to be instituted for the acquirement by condemnation of any lands or interests therein needed for the said work, the United States, upon the filing of the petition in any such proceedings, shall have the right to take immediate possession of said lands, easements, rights of way, or otherwise, to the extent of the interest to be acquired, and to proceed with the work herein authorized: Provided further, That certain adequate provisions shall have been made for the payment of just compensation to the party or parties entitled thereto, either by previous appropriations by the United States or by the deposit of moneys or other form of security in such amount and form as shall be approved by the court in which such proceedings shall be instituted. The respondent or respondents may move at any time in the court to increase or change the amounts or securities and the court shall make such order as shall be just in the premises and as shall adequately protect the respondents. In every case the proceedings in condemnation shall be diligently prosecuted on the part of the United States in order that such compensation may be promptly ascertained and paid: Provided further, That the Secretary of War shall submit to Congress on the first day of the next and each succeeding regular session of Congress, until the entire project shall have been completed, a report on said water system and increase of water supply showing, among other things, the progress of the work, construction under way and proposed within the District, connections with the present system of distribution, and revised estimates of cost.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado on behalf of the committee to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the subhead "Water department," on page 101, line 7, before the words "per month," to strike out "$10" and insert "$13," so as to make the paragraph read:

For maintenance of the water department distribution system, including pumping stations and machinery, water mains, valves, fire and public hydrants, water meters, and all buildings and accessories, and the purchase and maintenance of motor trucks, purchase of fuel, oils, waste, and other materials, and the employment of all labor necessary for the proper execution of this work, and to reimburse three employees for the provision and maintenance by themselves of three motor cycles for use in their official work in the District of Columbia $13 per month each; and for contingent expenses, including books, blanks, stationery, printing, postage, damages, purchase of technical reference books, and periodicals, not to exceed $75, and other necessary items, $10,000; in all, for maintenance, $450,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That completes the committee amendments, except those which have been passed over.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, there are some amendments which have been considered by the members of the subcommittee, as well as by the full Committee on Appropriations, which it was thought advisable to offer separately rather than to incorporate in the bill as reported by the committee. I have a series of them, which I will send to the desk and ask the Secretary to state in order. I offer the amendments.

Mr. HARRISON. Are these amendments purporting to carry out the program with respect to playgrounds and school buildings?

Mr. PHIPPS. They are included in this number. I am sending them to the desk now in the order in which they would properly occur in the bill.

Mr. HARRISON. As I understand, the amendments that the committee proposes at this time were adopted by the House Appropriations Committee, and were reported to the House, but went out on a point of order?

Mr. PHIPPS. Not all of them. Some of them are in that category, and others are new amendments proposed by the Senate Committee.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; but these with respect to the schools are carrying out the school program as mapped out by the Senate Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. PHIPPS. Some of them. For instance, we restore, I think, in every instance the school items that were stricken out on the floor of the House, and in addition to that the Senate Committee proposes some others which we think should be gone ahead with, particularly as to the acquisition of land. The Senator will recognize those items as they come up, and I will indicate which ones were stricken out on the floor of the House and which ones were not recommended by the House committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. At the bottom of page 14, it is proposed to insert a new paragraph reading as follows:

MOUNT PLEASANT BRANCH LIBRARY.

For the purchase of a site for a branch of the Free Public Library in the Mount Pleasant-Columbia Heights section of the District of Columbia, $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, and authority is hereby conferred upon the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to accept from the Carnegie Corporation of New York not less than $100,000 for the purpose of erecting a suitable branch library building on such a site, subject to the approval of said commissioners and the board of library trustees.

Mr. PHIPPS. That is an item which was recommended by the House committee and was stricken out on the floor of the House.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator what the view of the committee is with respect to these libraries? We have the Congressional Library, and then we have the Carnegie Library. Has the committee inaugurated any plan as to the number of library buildings that are to be erected within the District? How many are there to be?

Mr. PHIPPS. It has not. We have now as branches, in addition to the libraries named by the Senator, the Takoma branch and the Southeast branch, the latter having just gone into commission, and being patronized to-day away beyond the expectations of the Library Committee.

The Mount Pleasant site now proposed is out Sixteenth Street in a very desirable location, and the site is one which the owner is willing to let go at $25,000, though it would readily sell to-day for at least $50,000 for building purposes. Immediately in front of the plot of ground, lying between it and Sixteenth Street, is one of these small reservations that we had in mind a short time ago; so that from every standpoint the site selected is most desirable. Then, too, it is in the center of a territory that is practically all built up immediately around it, but within easy reach. The property is now being developed out Sixteenth Street, over to Eighteenth Street, and on the other side to Fourteenth Street, Thirteenth Street, and all the way to Georgia Avenue; so that this is really an ideal location for a library to serve the public, and, as I say, the site is perhaps the most desirable one that could be found in that location.

Mr. KING. I should like to ask the Senator whether the committee are of the opinion that it is better to have a considerable number of libraries scattered throughout the District, rather small in proportions and not having a large volume of books, or to have one or two very large libraries, not only as to the size of the buildings but as to capacity to furnish a large number of books to the public?

Mr. PHIPPS. The committee have discussed that subject; and in that connection, we have had information as to branch libraries being carried on in other cities. One large city, New York, has as many as 34, I think. My own home city, Denver, Colo., has 8, and yet the population there is about 265,000 to 275,000 people. The plan of erecting these branch libraries in different sections of the city appeals to us as being the proper one, particularly if a corporation such as the Carnegie Foundation stands ready and willing to pay for the structure, providing the District furnishes a suitable site. There is no requirement as to further expenditure for upkeep, or anything like that, but it is left to the decision of the Congress as to what should be appropriated for maintenance. Taking, as an example, this new southeast branch, the branches really will be utilized, and will have a very fine educational effect upon the people of the community. They will patronize the branch libraries right at home when they would not think of going in to the central libraries.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado on behalf of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, there is a new item here which has not had the consideration of the House. I will ask the Secretary to state it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated. The READING CLERK. On page 22, after line 19, it is proposed to insert:

For the erection of a fireproof addition to the courthouse of the District of Columbia for the use of the office of the recorder of deeds and such other activities of the District government as the commissioners may designate, including fireproof vaults and heating and ventilating apparatus, to be constructed under the supervision of and on plans to be furnished by the Architect of the Capitol and approved by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, $500,000.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I think a word of explanation would be in order.

The condition as to the present quarters for the recorder of deeds has been discussed at length on this floor, and the Senators present are perhaps familiar with that situation. To-day the records are not in a fireproof structure, and the force is hampered in its work by reason of restricted quarters, working in an insanitary building, with artificial light all of the business hours. Some change must be made there. In addition to that, the municipal court is quartered in a rented structure. The annual rental for the recorder of deeds is $6,000; for the municipal court, $3,600; and for the juvenile court, which is housed in a dwelling, $2,000.

In laying out Judiciary Square the original plan contemplated the erection of a building to duplicate the one now occupied by the court of appeals, which structure is a very beautiful piece of architecture. The proposed building would be located on the corresponding corner of the present Supreme Court Building, so that we now have the separate building to the right rear of the Supreme Court Building, and we would have this proposed new building to the left rear.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator whether it is intended to erect a complete building?

Mr. PHIPPS. A complete building. There is no structure there at present.

Mr. KING. Just for the recorder of deeds?

Mr. PHIPPS. No; for the recorder of deeds, the municipal court, and the juvenile court. We say in the amendment, "the recorder of deeds and such other activities of the District government as the commissioners may designate." It may be available for still other activities. Later on it might be used for the register of wills.

The Supreme Court Building is really crowded at the present time. There is no available space whatever there. We examined the Court of Appeals Building, and went over it from attic to cellar; and while it is a large building, and is housing only one activity, there is really no space there that could be converted to any of these uses.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator how many rooms there are in the Court of Appeals Building?

Mr. PHIPPS. It is rather a difficult matter to say how many rooms there are or what would be called rooms. For instance, under the roof there are unfinished spaces that might be converted into rooms, but they would not be lighted; they would not have proper air space, unless the architecture of the building were destroyed by cutting windows, for instance. In the basement all of that space eventually will be available for the storage of records. The building is as nearly fireproof as a building can be made, but in its architectural plan the space has not been economically laid out.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I can not understand the necessity for so much space for an appellate court. I am familiar with the courts in some of the Western States. An appellate court has its chamber, in which the judges meet to hear arguments, a library, an office for the clerk—usually one or two rooms—a room for a stenographer, and then a room for each of the judges. Aside from those, there is no necessity for additional rooms in an appellate court. It seems to me that some of the officials and agencies of the Government here in Washington have gotten the idea into their heads that they must have more room than is necessary, more room than is furnished in the States, where the work is just as onerous, and there is just as much of it as the work devolving upon the agencies here.

May I inquire of the Senator what is the size of the building?

Mr. PHIPPS. It is quite large. I should say that there are about 11,000 or 12,000 square feet on each of two floors, but in the case of the second and third floors the court room itself goes right up through the structure to the ceiling. It is a very high room; and these other rooms—the Senator asked me how many rooms there were—are scattered all around the corridors. We were hoping to find in that building available space to house the recorder of deeds, and we were disappointed to find that it would not be a possibility, and that it would not be a possibility even to find suitable space for the juvenile court, to say nothing of the municipal court.

Mr. KING. I must confess that from the description which has been given of this building I am astonished to know that there is no room there for more than the judges of the appellate court of the District. The Supreme Court of the United States has a small room in which it meets, and the judges have rather limited quarters. I should assume from what the Senator says and from what I know—and my knowledge of this building is quite imperfect—that the appellate court of the District has more room than the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. PHIPPS. The Senator is quite correct in his statement. I hope very much that he will take occasion to stop some morning on his way down to the Senate and go into the Court of Appeals Building, and see the condition that exists there, and give us the benefit of any suggestions that may occur to him whereby we could utilize some of what seems to our committee to be waste space.

Mr. KING. If the committee will just recommend restriction of the space for the appellate court, and introduce a bill to utilize the residue for other legitimate purposes, I am sure the Senate will follow him.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, that is exactly what the committee hoped it would find possible, but after the inspection it made it was forced to the conclusion that no such plan was practicable. If the Senator can suggest wherein any of these three activities can be cared for otherwise I am sure the committee would be very glad of the suggestion. Not one of the members felt it was possible, on account of the plan of that building, the way it was designed, the way it has been laid out, in spite of the fact that there is a very large floor area there to utilize it.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator whether the committee examined the District Building, which is a large one, and, as I was led to believe, was constructed for the purpose of housing more activities of the Government than are found within its walls; and whether, after such examination, he is satisfied that we may not restrict the space of some of the agencies there, and put other agencies of the District into the building?

Mr. PHIPPS. I will say to the Senator that the committee did not go to the District Building this time with that idea in view. The objection to that is its geographical location. It would be almost impossible to connect up the court activities of the recorder of deeds with the municipal building. It is necessary for attorneys and others who are dealing with the records to find near by the court records in the form of the deeds as recorded in the books. As an attorney, the Senator will recognize immediately that it would be practically impossible to house the recorder of deeds—and that is the most pressing activity of the three—in a building a mile and a half distant from the courthouse.

Mr. KING. It would not be impossible, but it would be rather inconvenient for litigants and for the courts. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. BALL. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator if he has visited the office of the recorder of deeds.

Mr. KING. Yes; but it was some time ago, I think three years ago.

Mr. BALL. When the Senator is inspecting the courts, I trust he will inspect the office of the recorder of deeds, and I am sure, if he will, he will come back here well satisfied with this appropriation.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I feel sure that there should be some provision made for the recorder of deeds, but I am not satisfied to vote for this appropriation with the limited information we have, and in view of the fact that we have made appropriations in this bill calling for such a large sum, and appropriations in the bill passed a few days ago for additional buildings in the District. I think we are getting building mad, and are appropriating too liberally for the erection of public buildings in Washington and in other parts of the United States. It seems to me we can afford to wait until next year before embarking upon this enterprise.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I have not been able to follow the pending bill closely, but I sincerely hope some provision is made for the lighting of the school buildings, some of which have not a single light in them. Some of these buildings are down in hollows, and I am informed that on dark days the children can scarcely see how to read at all. No wonder so many little chaps are going around Washington wearing glasses. I happen to know about a particular case where the school is very dingy and very dark. If we are going to appropriate money at all, we could not appropriate it for a better purpose than immediately to put lights into these buildings. I trust the subcommittee on the District of Columbia appropriations will give the matter immediate attention, and not wait until some future time. Is there anything in this bill on that subject?

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, for the information of the Senator from South Carolina I will state that the Senate committee has recommended, and this bill now carries, an increase of $50,000 over the amount recommended by the House, for repairs and improvements of school buildings, and the largest item to be cared for out of that is the lighting of the school buildings.

Mr. DIAL. I am happy to hear it, and I hope they will apply it immediately.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, the next amendment which I send to the desk is for the acquisition of two playgrounds. These items were recommended by the House committee and stricken from the bill on a point of order on the floor of the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The PRINCIPAL LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 36, after line 10, to insert:

For the purchase of a site now occupied by Hoover Playground, located in square 546, containing 65,000 square feet, at 25 cents per square foot, $17,000.

For the purchase of a site at Twenty-seventh and O Streets NW., in square 1238 (lot 803), containing 10,000 square feet, at an estimated cost of $5,000; and for the purchase of lot 804, square 1238, containing 3,840 square feet, at $3,000; in all, $8,000.

So much of any balance remaining after the purchase of sites for playgrounds authorized by this act as is necessary to clean up, grade, drain, fence in, and place such sites in safe and suitable condition for the purpose intended may be used for such purposes.

Mr. KING. Is it the purpose of this appropriation to round out some of the grounds already owned by the District?

Mr. PHIPPS. No; the Hoover playground is quite a good-sized tract, as the Senator will note, of which we have had the use for two or three years past. The owner has died and the property goes into the hands of the heirs, and the particular heir who now controls this property is willing to let us have it at 25 cents a square foot, which is, I would say, one-fourth of the present market price. It is in a built-up neighborhood in the northeast section of the city.

The other is for a playground for colored children at Twenty-seventh and O Streets, and the lot, offered at $5,000, would readily sell for more than double that figure. It belongs to a colored order, the initials or name of which I do not recall, but it is a beneficial order, like the Odd Fellows. In their desire to provide playgrounds for the children of that section the members of the order are not only willing to turn over the land they own at about half its market value to-day but they guarantee to the commissioners that the adjoining property, containing 3,840 square feet, will not cost the city more than $3,000, notwithstanding the fact that there is a fairly good brick building on the property, although it is old, and the owner will no doubt demand more than the $3,000. These colored men are going to make it good. Eight thousand dollars in all gives a very sizeable piece of ground, and it will connect up with the Rock Creek and Potomac Park driveway, which we had under discussion a while ago; so that it is a very desirable piece of property to acquire.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, the next amendment relates to the purchase of sites and the erection of school buildings, and of those the first three items were approved by the House committee and stricken out on a point of order on the floor of the House. That extends down to line 9, page 2, of this proposed amendment. I will just say, for information of Senators, that those items approved by the House committee are, as follows:

For the purchase of a site on which to locate a 16-room building between Georgia Avenue and Sixteenth Street NW., north of Park Road, $80,000;

For the erection of an 8-room extensible building on the site to be purchased in the vicinity of Georgia Avenue and Sixteenth Street NW., north of Park Road, $130,000;

For the erection of an 8-room extensible building, including a combination assembly hall and gymnasium, on the site to be purchased in the vicinity of and to relieve the Tenley School, $60,000;

For beginning the erection of a 16-room building, including a combination assembly hall and gymnasium, to replace the old John F. Cook School, $100,000, and the commissioners are hereby authorized to enter into contract or contracts for such building at a cost not to exceed $250,000;

For the purchase of a new site on which to locate a junior high school between Twentieth Street and Rock Creek and K and O Streets NW., or vicinity, $50,000.

The remaining items are new ones recommended by the Senate Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. KING. Let the amendment be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The READING CLERK. On page 53, after line 11, insert:

For the purchase of a site on which to locate a 16-room building between Georgia Avenue and Sixteenth Street NW., north of Park Road, $60,000;

For the erection of an 8-room extensible building on the site to be purchased in the vicinity of Georgia Avenue and Sixteenth Street NW., north of Park Road, $130,000;

For the erection of an 8-room extensible building, including a combination assembly hall and gymnasium, on the site to be purchased in the vicinity of and to relieve the Tenley School, $60,000;

For beginning the erection of a 16-room building, including a combination assembly hall and gymnasium, to replace the old John F. Cook School, $100,000, and the commissioners are hereby authorized to enter into contract or contracts for such building at a cost not to exceed $250,000;

For the purchase of a new site on which to locate a junior high school between Twentieth Street and Rock Creek and K and O Streets NW., or vicinity, $50,000;

For the purchase of land adjoining the Ludlow School, $15,000;

For the purchase of a site on which to locate a junior high school, north of Lincoln Park, $50,000;

For the purchase of land adjoining the Dunbar High School, $100,000;

For the purchase of a site near the Brightwood School, on which to erect a new school to replace the Brightwood School, $20,000;

For the purchase of a site near Kittenhouse and Fifth Street NW., $30,000;

For the purchase of a site north of Webster Street and east of Georgia Avenue, $45,000.

Mr. McKELLAR. May I ask if these various items have been authorized by the Budget?

Mr. PHIPPS. Most of them have been approved by the Budget.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not object to any of them; I think they all ought to be provided for; but I just wanted to see how far the committee comes into line with the Budget. Which items have the approval of the Budget and which have not?

Mr. PHIPPS. The items which were stricken out by the House had the approval of the Budget.

Mr. McKELLAR. Were the items remaining—those the Senator read awhile ago—approved by the Budget?

Mr. PHIPPS. They were approved by the Budget.

Mr. McKELLAR. And the remaining items, which the Senator did not read but which the Secretary has read, were not approved by the Budget?

Mr. PHIPPS. One or two of those were approved by the Budget but were not included by the House.

Mr. McKELLAR. Which ones were not approved by the Budget?

Mr. PHIPPS. The Budget did not approve the site for the location of a junior high school north of Lincoln Park.

Mr. McKELLAR. Was the matter presented to the Bureau of the Budget?

Mr. PHIPPS. I do not think our information will show how many of these were submitted to the Budget for their criticism. As the Budget comes to us, it is printed. It gives the recommendations of the Budget. In all cases it does not give the recommendation of the commissioners. In this matter the Board of Education has the first chance to recommend and does recommend to the commissioners. Then the commissioners, having in mind the amount of money they think they can afford to spend for school purposes, take out of the items what they think are the most important and recommend them to the Budget. Then the Budget may, and often does, cut out some of the recommendations of the commissioners.

Mr. McKELLAR. And then we come along and restore them.

Mr. PHIPPS. Yes; or we may add something entirely new. I want to be entirely frank with the Senator. If we go out on an inspection and find a location where there should be a school building which has not been approved by the Budget, our committee feel that we have the right to recommend that location to the Senate and let the Senate decide whether or not the appropriation should be made.

Mr. McKELLAR. Even though the whole matter had been submitted to the Budget and turned down by the Budget?

Mr. PHIPPS. In either case, whether it has or has not been passed upon by the Budget.

Mr. McKELLAR. In other words, it is one of those things about the Budget system, as it is being carried out, to which I have already called the attention of the Senate. The Budget plan is being violated whenever it is the desire of committees of the Senate to violate it and send in instructions to the contrary. I am not opposed to the proposition for schools, because I think we could make no mistake by building school buildings where they are necessary, and I am willing to take the committee's recommendation for it. But it seems remarkable, if we have a Budget Bureau, that they should fall so short of finding out the facts and presenting them to the Congress. If they fall short as often as they have fallen short in the pending bill, and if they are to be overruled as often as they are being overruled in the pending bill, how much respect will we continue to have for any recommendations the Budget may make out of the ordinary?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I would like some further explanation from the Senator in charge of the bill. I want to state to him, as I called attention to the matter yesterday, that the joint committee of the Senate and the House had devolved upon it the duty of investigating the school situation in the District. That meant not only the mechanical features of the school system, not only the buildings which were needed, but also to investigate the entire curriculum and the school system in its entirety.

As I suggested yesterday, some of the most eminent educators of the United States were brought before the committee. We took up the question of the size of the schoolhouse, whether it was to the advantage of a proper educational system to have larger units than heretofore had been erected or to maintain the present system, whether the system of high schools as it now exists in the District should be perpetuated or modified. All of those questions were gone into at very great length, as well as the educational features of the school system of the District.

I regret that our joint committee has not yet submitted its report. I think I can say without betraying any confidence that all of the members of the committee were of opinion that a number of schoolhouses should be erected, that material modifications should be made in the character of the buildings, and that perhaps as much as from $5,000,000 or $6,000,000 to $8,000,000 or $10,000,000 would be required within the next few years in order to erect sufficient and suitable buildings for educational purposes within the District.

There are a number of points upon which the members of the joint committee are not yet in agreement, or, at least, we have not sufficiently discussed all of the points, probably, to iron out unimportant differences which exist in the minds of the members of the committee.

I am not sure, Mr. President, that the amendment which has been offered by the distinguished Senator from Colorado in behalf of the committee will conform to the report which ultimately will be offered to the committee. I notice that the amendment indicates the size of the building. I feel sure that some of the buildings for which provision is made in the amendment will be different in character from what a majority at least of the committee will recommend. I was impressed by the testimony before the committee with the thought that the unit should be larger. The amendment seems to contemplate the old system of buildings—the 4-room, 8-room, and 16-room style.

I am not ready to vote for the amendment with the limited information which I have, not because there is no need for buildings; quite the reverse. I have been so impressed with the need for additional buildings that I have repeatedly said we would need from $6,000,000 to $10,000,000 in the near future to provide adequate buildings for the District of Columbia.

Mr. BALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KING. Certainly.

Mr. BALL. I would like to state that it is due to the failure of the joint committee to make its report that we have had to offer the amendments which we have offered, subject to the point of order. I was responsible for the appointing of the joint committee of which the Senator has spoken. Both the committee of the House and the committee of the Senate having to do with matters relating to the District of Columbia have refused to recommend any legislation governing the schools or school buildings, awaiting the report of the joint committee.

I was present in the House when the point of order was made against the various provisions for erecting the buildings as well as for the purchase of land. The House Committee on the District of Columbia was censured very severely for not having presented the necessary legislation to provide for the purchase. I feel that the necessary legislation has not been enacted for a very just reason. When we enact legislation we want to do it on the basis of the report of a committee which has made a thorough examination. I have requested the joint committee to make its report previous to the preparation of the District of Columbia appropriation bill, but, owing to the absence of one or two members of the joint committee and a desire to receive a report, I think, from some person from whom some testimony was expected on some special feature of the building proposition, I was told they were not ready to make the report.

I do not believe we should hold up the building of the proper schools for the District of Columbia because we have not all the information we had hoped to get. We must meet conditions as they arise. I hope that the program submitted by the joint committee will agree with the program recommended by the Appropriations Committee. If not, we will try to adjust in the future whatever buildings may be erected now and the locations selected for those buildings with the joint committee's general plan; but I trust the committee will make its report so that early in the next Congress proper legislation may be reported and enacted.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. PHIPPS. I would like to call attention to the fact that the buildings which are now being constructed and planned for are all being erected on extensible sites, so called—that is to say, if we erect an eight-room structure, we could later add an additional eight-room structure and utilize the central heating plant and the other facilities, which would become joint for the 16-room building. The tendency is to erect larger structures to-day, rather than to scatter small ones over more territory.

Mr. KING. The statement made by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL] is largely true. The joint committee has failed to report, and it is very unfortunate that the Committee on Appropriations did not have the report of the joint committee before them in drafting the bill dealing with educational matters. What I am afraid of, let me say to the Senator, is that, dealing with the subject in this piecemeal fashion, there will be much done that will have to be undone, or it will lead to extravagance and to an improvident course. It seems to me, in view of the fact that we are so short of school buildings and that so many of the present buildings have so deteriorated that they are unsuitable and ought to be torn down, that a plan ought to be devised to deal with the subject in a comprehensive and complete manner.

We are very much in the situation of a large city that has no public buildings to house its employees, its courts, and so forth. It is free from the restriction and inhibitions that would arise if it had a lot of incomplete or imperfect buildings which it felt as if it could not reject and must utilize as best it might.

Now, if we purchase all the places which are indicated and start the erection of the buildings which are indicated, I am afraid it will interfere with the comprehensive plan that would give us buildings which must cost, in my opinion, at least $6,000,000 to $10,000,000. I am entirely in sympathy with the program that calls for more buildings, but I want a program that will produce a unified system, a coordinated system, and buildings which are modern and up to date, scientifically and sanitarily constructed. I do not believe many of the buildings we now have ought to be used longer than is absolutely necessary to supplant them. They ought to be torn down. If we should develop a plan and build to that, coordinating all of the buildings we now have and then getting additional buildings, it would be far better than going at it in piecemeal style.

Mr. BALL. Mr. President—

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. BALL. I think I can assure the Senator that the purchase of the land will not interfere with his general plan, because we are purchasing the land in the different sections of the city which need the schools. We are securing locations in the most central part of the built-up densely populated sections of the city which are not properly provided with schools. The high schools are distributed to the different parts of the city.

So far as concerns the location proposed in the pending bill, I am sure it will not interfere with the plan of the joint committee. I am extremely sorry the joint committee did not make its report in time to get the general plan and size of the buildings before the Committee on Appropriations to use in the formulation of the District appropriation bill which we are now considering.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator whether in the proposed purchases the committee have taken into account the necessary grounds for playgrounds?

Mr. BALL. They have.

Mr. KING. The Senator knows, from an examination of the situation, that in some sections of the city there are no playgrounds at all.

Mr. BALL. I can assure the Senator that the proposition has been very carefully guarded in the selection and extent of the areas to be acquired.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah yield to me to ask the Senator from Delaware a question?

Mr. KING. Certainly.

Mr. McKELLAR. I wish to ask the Senator from Delaware if, when these buildings are constructed, we will then have enough school buildings? I have seen a great many statements in the newspapers about our lack of school buildings. Of course, to my mind it is a very serious condition and one that ought to be remedied at once. Even though we may not have the plans, I am perfectly willing—aye, not only willing, but anxious—that it be done, by all means. We ought to have the necessary buildings. When we erect those which have been authorized in the amendment, will they furnish sufficient buildings for the school system of the city?

Mr. BALL. They will not. There were no school buildings erected during the World War; the population has continued to increase, and we are not more than meeting the growing demands of the last two years. It will take several years before we catch up on the construction of school buildings, and have a sufficient number to equal the increased demands.

Mr. McKELLAR. When is the report from the joint committee expected to be made?

Mr. BALL. I hope it will be made before the present Congress goes out of existence.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, it seems to be a very remarkable situation, that here, at the Capital of the richest country in the world, we have not enough school buildings for the school children of this city. I think we ought to leave no stone unturned in order to provide an adequate number of buildings and sufficient school facilities for the children of Washington at the earliest day possible.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I shall not raise a point of order against this amendment, relying upon the statement of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL] and the statement of my friend from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS] that these recommendations will not interfere with any well-considered plan that may hereafter be offered to provide necessary school buildings. I shall not oppose the amendment, although I regret that we are not in a situation to adopt a plan that would provide for all needed school buildings and comprehend the needs of the District for a number of years to come.

In my opinion, we should devise and adopt a plan that would take into account the growth of the city—and its growth will be rapid—and provide buildings and a proper and modern school system adequate for present needs and elastic enough to meet future requirements. A plan of that kind, properly adjusted and properly coordinated and integrated, would call for the expenditure of, perhaps, $10,000,000. If we could have such a plan and could locate the buildings with reference to the immediate and prospective needs of the people, it would in the long run be economy and would make for a better educational system. I am afraid, however, that if these amendments be adopted we shall do as we have done in the past, build in a piecemeal style; that we shall put a building in plot A of a certain size and have immediately to remodel or change it or transfer the school from that point to some other for the reason it will be found unsuitable to fit in with a general, comprehensive, and proper educational building system. However, Senators upon the committee have given considerable attention to this matter, and I shall rely upon their judgment, expressing my apprehension that we will soon find that we run counter to a more matured and comprehensive plan which will be adopted dealing with the educational needs of the District.

Mr. President, let me say in conclusion that I note that some of the buildings provided for in this bill, comprising but a few rooms, are to cost from $135,000 to $160,000. I have said before with respect to the cost of building in the city of Washington that prices are too high. Some builders and contractors and others have robbed the people, and assigned themselves to the category of profiteers. I think that there are conspiracies in the District upon the part of individuals and organizations and corporations to maintain extortionate prices.

Some time ago, on the suggestion of Secretary Hoover and myself, a committee was appointed under the auspices of the District Commissioners. I shall not characterize the conduct or the work of the committee, but it very soon developed, Mr. President, that the committee would fail in reaching the cause of continued evils; and it became manifest that impediments were being offered to an investigation of the profits that were being made by certain concerns and organizations, and that obstacles were being interposed to a proper and exhaustive inquity as to whether or not conspiracies and combinations in restraint of trade and for the maintenance of high prices existed in the District of Columbia. I think the whole matter ought to go before the grand jury; I think the district attorney of the District of Columbia ought to summon a grand jury to inquire into the matter of the high prices in building and building materials and supplies and all cognate matters. The idea of a little building, almost square, with four walls, costing such enormous prices as indicated in this bill can not be defended. It shows, Mr. President, that there is something wrong in the building situation in the District of Columbia, and I sincerely hope that the District Commissioners, or whoever lets the contracts, will, before they are let, make an investigation and will protect the interests of the taxpayers against the extortionate demands of combinations and conspirators within the District.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment offered on behalf of the committee is agreed to.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment, to come in on page 66, with relation to dairy-farm inspection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 66, line 10, after the figures "$8,000," it is proposed to insert:

And this appropriation shall be available for such other and additional traveling expenses as, in the judgment of the health officer, may be necessary for the proper inspection of dairy farms.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, that language was stricken out on the floor of the House, the House committee having included it. To-day the inspectors of dairies are covering over 1,500 farms which are located in Maryland and Virginia. Many of those farms are more than 20 miles distant from the District line. There is no provision of law that will permit the allowance to inspectors of their traveling expenses for railway fares; so they have been compelled to use automobiles to go on these long trips. The object of this amendment is to enable the commissioners to allow the railway fares to the inspectors and to save the use of automobiles.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is quite an innovation. What is the appropriation that is asked for railroad fares? Is it $8,000?

Mr. PHIPPS. Oh, no. The amendment relates to an appropriation of $8,000 for necessary expenses in connection with the inspection of dairy farms, and will merely permit, if it shall be adopted, railroad fares to be included in traveling expenses. The Senator will find the provision at the top of page 66. There is one item included in it which involves the automobile question which we have passed over, but the amendment I have offered is separate and apart from that.

Mr. McKELLAR. Then it is proposed to permit the officials of this department to use automobiles and also allow them money for railroad fare?

Mr. PHIPPS. Of course they must have automobiles; they have them to-day.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I wish to ask, Is the appropriation increased?

Mr. PHIPPS. The appropriation is $8,000, and the amendment does not increase the appropriation at all.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the amendment does not increase the appropriation, I am not going to object to it. I would just as soon have them spending the Government money on railroad fare as to spend it on automobiles. I do not approve of the waste of the people's money for either purpose. I will not contest the amendment.

Mr. BALL. It is in the interest of economy; it will save the Government money.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado on behalf of the committee is agreed to.

Mr. PHIPPS. On page 79, in connection with the item relating to the National Training School for Girls, an appropriation was estimated for. I send an amendment to the desk to cover the amount recommended and ask that it may be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado on behalf of the committee will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 79, after line 20, it is proposed to insert the following:

That the board of trustees of the National Training School for Girls of the District of Columbia, a body corporate, is hereby authorized and directed to purchase, subject to the approval of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, a tract of land of not more than 160 acres, to be situated in the District of Columbia or in the State of Maryland or in the State of Virginia, for the use of said school, and the said board of trustees are hereby authorized to construct on said tract two buildings of sufficient capacity to accommodate not more than 150 persons, the plans and specifications for which shall be approved by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia before acceptance by said board of trustees: Provided, That the purchase price for the said tract of land, the erection of the said buildings, and all expenses incidental thereto shall not exceed the sum of $62,000, which amount is hereby appropriated. The title to the said tract of land shall be taken directly to and in the name of the United States; and in case a satisfactory price can not be agreed upon for the purchase of said tract, or in case the title to said tract can not be made satisfactory to the Attorney General of the United States, then the latter is directed to procure said tract of land by condemnation, and the expense of procuring evidence of title or of condemnation, or both, shall be paid out of the appropriation herein made for the purchase of said tract. The said board of trustees may, within their discretion, transport to the aforesaid tract for such periods as they may see fit any of the girls which may have been committed to said school in the District of Columbia, and the said board of trustees shall have the same power and authority over such girls during the period of their commitment to said tract or while they are being conducted to or from said tract as they now possess over such girls within the limits of the District of Columbia.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, reserving the point of order on the amendment, I should like to have an explanation of it.

Mr. PHIPPS. The National Training School for Girls is an activity that necessarily has to be conducted. It takes care of girls who have been sent to the institution by the juvenile court. The present quarters, as I understand, are located on the Conduit Road close to the District line, and there are, as I remember, 66 inmates of the institution at the present time, some of them being white and some of them colored. There being just one such institution provided the girls of necessity are thrown together a good part of the time, for it is not possible fully to segregate the white girls from the colored girls so many of their activities being necessarily in common.

Mr. McKELLAR. If this amendment shall be adopted, will it provide for a separation of the races?

Mr. PHIPPS. It will provide for a separation of the races. It will enable a tract of land of 160 acres to be purchased. It is desirable that some such area should be acquired in order to allow an opportunity to carry on the gardening work and other out-of-door activities and to keep the colored girls and the white girls apart.

Mr. CARAWAY. Is it proposed to teach farming to the girls?

Mr. PHIPPS. Oh, no; not necessarily; but to teach them gardening, perhaps. I believe there are some female gardeners in various places. The total cost authorized is $62,000.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, so many of these organizations and institutions are provided for in this bill that without very careful study one is apt to be confused. I find, on page 85, "Industrial Home School."

Mr. PHIPPS. Yes; and the Senator will find on page 83 provision for the feeble-minded.

Mr. KING. I find, also, "Industrial Home School for Colored Children," "Child-caring institutions," "Board of Children's Guardians."

Mr. PHIPPS. That is a heading in the bill. Under "Child-caring institutions" we have the Board of Children's Guardians, which is the board in control of these child-caring institutions, and which, under the advice of the courts and in pursuance of the court orders, provides the quarters for children in these various institutions or in private homes.

Mr. KING. Then we have "National Training School for Boys," "National Training School for Girls," "Reformatory," "Workhouse," "Charities and Corrections," and I do not know how many more of these public institutions. May I ask the Senator what relation there is between all of these organizations? And may not some of them be combined, in the interest of economy, and in the interest of the correction and salvation—if I may use so extravagant an expression—of those committed to their care?

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, it would be rather a large undertaking for me to attempt to furnish the Senator information that it has taken me days and I should say weeks to acquire by devoting my time to visiting some of these institutions. I frankly confess that I am not qualified to tell him just where the lines of demarcation are drawn. That is the province of the Board of Charities—consisting of reputable men and women, who are performing service for the District of Columbia without pay, without reward of any kind—to carry on the activities that must necessarily be carried on in every large city. Whether or not Washington has a greater number of institutions or a greater variety than other cities of its size, I can not say offhand; but bear in mind that we have the necessity for segregating the white and the colored populations.

Mr. McKELLAR. Is this the establishment of a new institution?

Mr. PHIPPS. Not at all.

Mr. McKELLAR. What one is it in connection with—what provision of the bill?

Mr. PHIPPS. The Senator will find it at the top of page 79, as read from the amendment. The amendment—which has been printed and lying on the Senator's desk since the first of the week—shows that it is to continue and enlarge and properly provide for the activities of that institution. It is something that must be maintained. There is very great and serious complaint about the quarters where these girls are housed at present, and the capacity is too limited. They are unable to take care of the number that they should have in that institution at the present time. They should have a capacity of at least 125; and with that in mind we are providing now a capacity of 150, which is not an unreasonable excess.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I am making no complaint about providing for all needful reformatory institutions. The point I am making is that there seems to be too many or at least a very large number of reformatories and correctional institutions; and I was wondering whether, in the interest of economy and in the interest of better service for those who are so confined or placed within these institutions, some of the institutions might not be combined. For instance, on page 77 provision is made for the reformatory, and a large number of employees, with salaries, clerks, and whatnot. Then, on page 78, provision is made for the National Training School for Boys, and on page 79 for the National Training School for Girls, with a large number of employees—

Mr. PHIPPS. That is the one we are speaking of—the National Training School for Girls—but a reformatory is a penal institution. You can not send to that institution children who have committed no crime.

Mr. KING. Then on page 85 is the Industrial Home School. How is that to be differentiated from the one we are talking about?

Mr. PHIPPS. That is quite a different activity. Where a child is not being properly cared for in its home and complaint is made, the juvenile-court judge passes on the case; and if it is found that in the interest of the child it should be removed, it is turned over to the custody of the Board of Children's Guardians. Under the present plan they will temporarily place the child in this Industrial Home School until they can find some one who will provide a home for the child and take care of it, and, in cases where they have the parents' consent or where the child has no parents, they will adopt the child. It is a question of finding proper and suitable homes for those young children. The institution we now have under discussion—the National Training School for Girls—is for older girls, girls from 10 to 14 or 15 years of age. They teach them dress-making and domestic science, teach them to wash and iron and do things like that, train them for proper life, so that they can care for themselves, with a view to making them self-supporting and able to go out by the time they are 18 years of age.

Mr. KING. The reformatory deals with those who have been convicted of some offense?

Mr. PHIPPS. Yes.

Mr. KING. And the authorities do not wish to send them to the penitentiary, and therefore commit them to the reformatory? I am trying to distinguish between the function of the reformatory and the function of the training school.

Mr. PHIPPS. It is for grown-ups and, as I stated, it is a penal institution. People who have committed crimes are sent there. It is known as the Occoquan institution.

Mr. KING. Oh, yes; whereas the National Training School for Boys and the National Training School for Girls deal with those who are immature?

Mr. PHIPPS. Yes.

Mr. KING. And whose offenses, if they are offenses, are unimportant? Perhaps they should be denominated their delinquencies.

Mr. PHIPPS. The present item seeks to do for the girls exactly what we have already done for the boys in providing a proper national training school.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, of course it is the duty of the Government to erect such needed institutions for persons of the character described as Congress deems proper. The point I am trying to get at is that there seems to be an overlapping of so many of these institutions. It occurs to me that it would be wise to investigate all of them, with a view to coordinating and perhaps eliminating some of these institutions. I do not know enough about this particular item to have any opinion on the subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado on behalf of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, on page 81, after line 14, the committee favors an amendment in language similar to that which was in the bill when it passed the Senate last year but to which the House conferees declined to agree.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 81, after line 14, it is proposed to insert:

Hereafter, patients may be admitted to the Tuberculosis Hospital for care and treatment at such rates and under such regulations as may be established by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and all moneys received from this source shall be credited to the current appropriation for maintenance of said hospital.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, on page 82, after line 7, a similar amendment is proposed with reference to the Gallinger Municipal Hospital, which was also carried in last year's bill as approved by the Senate, but was declined by the House conferees.

Mr. KING. What objection was there to it?

Mr. PHIPPS. The objection is, as to the Tuberculosis Hospital, that it is a charitable institution. There are some people who do not feel that they are in a position where they should accept full charity. They want to make a payment on account, to the limit of their ability. Perhaps they can afford to pay $5 a week where they could not pay the full charge in some other institution. This would permit of their admission to this charitable hospital by their making a donation, if they so desire.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I want to suggest to the Senator that in the committee amendment, on page 78, a different policy is adopted from the one that is suggested in these two amendments. In the amendment on page 78 it is provided that—

All moneys hereafter received at the reformatory as income thereof from the sale of brooms to the various branches of the government of the District of Columbia shall remain available for the manufacture of additional brooms to be similarly disposed of.

That was stricken out, and those moneys are to be covered into the Treasury on the ground, as the Senator stated this morning, that it is better for the Congress to appropriate the actual sums necessary to carry on the work and let the income go into the Treasury. I thought it was a very wise policy, and supported the Senator's amendment. Now the Senator offers two amendments here, and provides that the income that arises from these sources, instead of going into the Treasury, as is provided here, shall go to the institutions and be used by the institutions. I doubt the wisdom of that policy. I hope the Senator will change his amendment so as to strike out that particular part of it, let the money go into the Treasury, and let us appropriate for the institution. It is much wiser legislation.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I submit for the Senator's consideration the fact that those items are not comparable at all. The one is a case of manufacture; the other is a case of manufacturing an article that is sold. They already have the labor, and we have provided the money for the material. There we feel that the money received from the sale should go back into the Treasury; but in this case we are making provision under which additional patients may be admitted to a hospital where there are ample facilities for caring for them, and permit them to make a payment on account. We are simply allowing them to contribute a part of the additional cost incident to their admission to the hospital. I do not think the items are comparable. I hardly feel that the Senator's point is well taken.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have no objection to the amendment if the amounts received are covered into the Treasury. Otherwise, I make a point of order against both of the amendments.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I think one of them was adopted.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator the reason for the increase in the item on page 78 from $52,000 to $60,000?

Mr. PHIPPS. We have an additional number of inmates coming to the reformatory, and we did not agree to the House provision. We were well within the estimate in raising the amount. The estimate was for more than that.

Mr. KING. Will the proceeds derived from the sale of any property be covered into the Treasury?

Mr. PHIPPS. Yes; they must be.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I shall make a point of order against the amendment unless the Senator is willing to modify it. I am perfectly willing not to make the point of order if it is modified.

Mr. PHIPPS. I ask a question for information. Was the first amendment, relating to the tuberculosis hospital, adopted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That was agreed to.

Mr. PHIPPS. Then I understand the Senator is making a point of order against the amendment in relation to the Gallinger Hospital?

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent to go back to the preceding amendment, because the two amendments are exactly the same in that particular. I want to make a point of order against the other one unless my suggestion is followed.

Mr. PHIPPS. I do not see any serious objection to the Senator's proposal. Certainly there is no serious objection to having it done in that way. I was trying to point out to the Senator the reason why we thought this was not in the same category with the manufacture of brooms. However, we think it very desirable to have that incorporated in the bill; and therefore, in order to meet the Senator's views, I am willing to modify those two amendments, going back to the amendment for the tuberculosis hospital and striking out the language which reads, "and all moneys received from this source shall be credited to the current appropriation for maintenance of said hospital," so that under the law it would then go into the Treasury.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is entirely satisfactory.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as modified.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on modifying the amendment on page 81, line 14.

Mr. PHIPPS. There I move to further amend by striking out the language which has been read, "and all moneys received," and so forth.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the vote by which the amendment was agreed to will be reconsidered, and the question is on agreeing to the amendment as modified.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

Mr. PHIPPS. On page 83 the Senate committee proposes an amendment with reference to the home for the feeble-minded. When the appropriation bill for 1923 was under consideration the Senate Appropriation Committee recommended certain language and an appropriation for the acquisition of a home for the feeble-minded. That was introduced by the Senate, not having been contained in the bill as it passed the House. The bill went to conference, and after many inspection trips, requiring some days and much effort, on the insistence of the House the Senate conferees finally agreed to recommend and did recommend to the Senate the House contention that the home for the feeble-minded should be located on a piece of property belonging to the District and known as Blue Plains.

The buildings authorized have not yet been erected on that site. There is strong and general complaint against the utilization of that building site for the proposed home for the feeble-minded. I feel that there is undoubtedly good ground for that opposition, although at the time I felt that the need for the home was so urgent that it was much better to accept that objectionable site rather than to lose the project, and I know my fellow conferees had the same view. But we acceded to the House proposition. In view of the fact that the buildings have not been erected we desire now to have inserted the language of last year's bill by reporting the item as it was approved in the appropriation bill of 1923 and substituting the original language. I desire that the Secretary report the amendment.

Mr. KING. What provisions will now be made for the feeble-minded?

Mr. PHIPPS. There is practically none made, except housing them out, as may be, wherever they can be cared for. We have no institution in which to house them, and here we have the proposition not only of segregating the races but segregating the sexes as well, which is very important.

Mr. KING. Let the amendment be read.

The READING CLERK. On page 83, after line 5, insert the following:

The paragraph in the District of Columbia appropriation act for the fiscal year 1923, approved June 29, 1922, which reads as follows—

"The Commissioners of the District of Columbia are authorized and directed to use a site for a home and school for feeble-minded persons, said site to be located in the District of Columbia on lands owned by the District of Columbia and now allotted to the Home for the Aged and Infirm, and to erect thereon suitable buildings at a total cost not exceeding $250,000, and toward said purpose there is hereby appropriated the sum of $100,000, to be immediately available. The persons to be admissible thereto and the proceedings with reference to securing such admission to be in accordance with law"—is hereby repealed; and the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are authorized and directed to acquire a site for a home and school for feeble-minded persons, said site to be located in the District of Columbia or in the State of Maryland or in the State of Virginia, and to erect thereon suitable buildings at a total cost not exceeding $300,000, of which not more than $40,000 shall be expended for a site, and toward said purpose there is appropriated the sum of $125,000 to be immediately available; if the land proposed to be acquired is within the District of Columbia, and the same can not be acquired by purchase at a price satisfactory to the commissioners, they are authorized to condemn the same under the provisions of chapter 15 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia. If the land can not be acquired within the District of Columbia, the Attorney General of the United States, at the request of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, shall institute condemnation proceedings to acquire such land as may be selected for said site either in the State of Maryland or in the State of Virginia in accordance with the laws of said States, the title of said land to be taken directly to and in the name of the United States, but the land so acquired shall be under the jurisdiction of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia as agents of the United States, and expenses of procuring evidence of title or of condemnation, or both, shall be paid out of the appropriation herein made for the purchase of said site.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business to-day it recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, we have been meeting at 11 for some days, and some of us have committee meetings in the morning. Will not the Senator make it 12 o'clock?

Mr. JONES of Washington. We are very anxious to get started with the rural credits bill, which is for the benefit of farmers, and with another appropriation bill, which is to be reported to-morrow.

Mr. KING. What appropriation bill is that?

Mr. JONES of Washington. The legislative appropriation bill. It is very desirable that we should begin the consideration of business which the committees have actually reported, and which is on the calendar. I hope the Senator will not object.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator expect to take up the appropriation bill to-morrow? It has not yet been reported.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I heard the Senator from Utah [Mr. Smoot] say that he has it ready to report. I do not know whether he will report it to-day or not.

Mr. SMOOT. It will be ready to report just as quickly as we can have it printed after 12 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Senators are very anxious to get started on the rural credits bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the appropriation bill will be printed and ready to consider before the rural credits bill is disposed of.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is probably true.

Mr. KING. Then the appropriation bill referred to will probably not come up to-morrow.

Mr. SMOOT. Not before 3 or 4 o'clock in the afternoon, anyway.

Mr. KING. As the Senator knows, that bill contains some important items, and there will be no chance to see what is in it before to-morrow morning.

Mr. SMOOT. This is the legislative bill, not the Army bill. The Army appropriation bill will not be ready for reporting until Friday, I think, perhaps Saturday.

Mr. KING. I shall not object to the Senate recessing until 11 o'clock, although I wish the Senator would fix the hour at 12 o'clock.

Mr. JONES of Washington. We are very anxious to get started on the rural credits measure.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I regret to object to anything the Senator from Washington requests, but when we attend to our other business in the forenoon we can not get here at 11 o'clock. I think we will make just as much progress if we meet at 12, and I hope the Senator will not press his request. I am a great believer in work, but there is such a thing as becoming tired and not accomplishing as much as could be done in a shorter space of time. I think we will do just as well if we meet at 12 o'clock, and I hope the Senator will not urge his request.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I shall endeavor to have the Senate recess, when we conclude our business to-day, until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. HARRISON. In this connection I want to ask a question or two. I wish to inquire what it is intended shall be taken up to-morrow when the pending bill gets out of the way, if it does get out of the way this afternoon?

Mr. JONES of Washington. It is intended that the Lenroot rural credits bill shall be taken up.

Mr. HARRISON. Then, when any appropriation bill is ready Senators will sidetrack the rural credits bill and take up the appropriation bill, if the rural credits bill shall not have been disposed of in the meantime?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am not certain as to that. I do not control that matter, but I imagine Senators all want to get the appropriation bills out of the way.

Mr. HARRISON. There are only two appropriation bills left, are there not?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think so.

Mr. HARRISON. The legislative appropriation bill and the Army appropriation bill?

Mr. JONES of Washington. The legislative bill and the Army bill; and then whatever deficiency appropriation bill may come over from the House.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is not quite certain about the request of the Senator from Washington for unanimous consent.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I understood that there was objection, and I shall not make a motion at this time, but I expect to make a motion when the time comes to close the business of the day, unless we get along extraordinarily well.

Mr. HARRISON. Does not the Senator from Washington think we have been getting along pretty well with the pending District of Columbia appropriation bill?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I will be ready to answer that question along about 5 o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, on page 91, after line 15, we desire to recommend an amendment which I will ask the Secretary to report. It is new matter entirely.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 91, after line 15, insert:

The Board of Engineers constituted by Public Act No. 441, approved March 2, 1911, is hereby directed to submit through the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, on or before the first day of the next regular session of Congress a report recommending such modifications in existing project for Anacostia Park above Benning Bridge as may now appear desirable and in the interest of economy.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, we desire that direction, and the engineers really want it also, the point being this: A survey was made some years ago and lines for property to be taken above the Benning Bridge approved. The work below the Benning Bridge has been nearly completed, so that the appropriation carried in this pending bill will enable them to complete all dredging and get well along with the sea-wall work. For the last three years we have declined to let any money appropriated to be used above the Benning Bridge, one reason being the thought the engineers had in mind that it would be necessary to put draw spans in a couple of bridges in order to get the dredges through. I think they are now convinced they can move those dredges and get them above the Benning Bridge without having to erect drawbridges. They can jack them up and move them along on rollers.

Now, next year the work of recovering lands above the Benning Bridge should be undertaken. Before doing that, the committee feel that the higher ground would cost too much to justify the taking; that eliminating some of the high ground we would have as a minimum 250 acres above the Benning Road that would be available for park purposes. It is the thought of the committee that the amount of land to be acquired should be restricted as far as possible, cutting down the amount, and therefore we are asking to have the engineers make a new survey and fix new lines.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PHIPPS. I offer an amendment to come in on page 97, after line 24. The amendment relates to Rock Creek Park. It is language which was stricken from the bill on the floor of the House.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 97, after line 24, the last line on the page, insert the following:

Provided, That the following areas and parcels described and delineated on map No. 2, contained in House Document No. 1114, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, as a part of total area to be acquired for said parkway shall be excluded from the total area finally to be acquired, to wit, 815 square feet of lot 801 in square 2541, 349 square feet of lot 836, 1,303 square feet of lot 74 in square 2543, 549 square feet of lot 58, 2,106 square feet of lot 800 in square 1262, 3,600 square feet of lot 20 in square 23, 199 square feet of lot 80 in square 1238, and 60 square feet of lot 3 in square No. 1: Provided further, That the following described lots and parcels that are without the taking line shall be included in the area finally to be acquired, namely, 4,483 square feet of lot No. 1, 2,919 square feet of lot 2, 3,259 square feet of lot 3 in square 2510, 6,879 square feet of lot 1 in square 47, and about 902 square feet of lot 803 in square 2543: Provided further, That in order to protect Rock Creek and its tributaries, none of the moneys herein or heretofore appropriated for the opening, widening, or extending of any street, avenue, or highway in the District of Columbia shall be extended for the opening, widening, or extension of any street, avenue, or highway which shall or may in the judgment of the District Commissioners permanently injure or diminish the existing flow of Rock Creek or any of its tributaries, nor shall permission so to do at private expense be granted to any private person or corporation except by the joint consent and approval of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia and the officer in charge of public buildings and grounds.

Mr. PHIPPS. For the most part these are simply metes and bounds that are incorporated so that certain property heretofore authorized to be taken under condemnation or purchase is now eliminated. It simply provides that those areas shall be excluded from the taking for park purposes.

Mr. KING. Has suit been brought to condemn?

Mr. PHIPPS. They have acquired all they desire in the location covered by the particular area, and now they are declaring that they do not desire to take these certain pieces, which releases the owners of the property, so there is no cloud remaining on their title and they can go ahead and sell it or dispose of it as they please.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PHIPPS. On page 97, after line 24, relating to the same activity, I offer another amendment which is new; that is, it was not approved by the House. It was considered by the House committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. Insert after the amendment last agreed to the following:

The authority of the commission is hereby extended to acquire by purchase or condemnation or otherwise the following additional tracts of land for park purposes, to wit: The tract known as the Klinge Valley Park, containing about 8 acres, as shown on map filed in the office of the executive officer of the Rock Creek and Potomac Parkway Commission and designated as the map of Klinge Valley Park, dated January 12, 1923; the Piney Branch Valley Park, containing about 6 acres, as shown on map filed in the office of the executive officer of the Rock Creek and Potomac Parkway Commission and designated as the map of Piney Branch Valley Park, dated January 12, 1923; and a portion of the tract known as the Patterson tract, being parcel 129/2, except the portion of the west side of said tract, indicated as eliminated from said tract by a map filed in the office of the executive officer of the Rock Creek and Potomac Parkway Commission and designated as map of the Patterson tract, dated January 12, 1923, containing about 70 acres. The commission is further authorized to reduce the area to be acquired in either of said tracts, where by reason of improvements constructed or unreasonable prices asked or for other reasons in their judgment the public interest may require and the limit hereinafter fixed to be paid for said tracts shall be reduced accordingly: Provided, That if acquired by purchase the cost of the respective tracts shall not exceed the following sums: The Klinge Valley Park, $155,950; the Piney Branch Valley Park, $94,050; and that portion of the Patterson tract above designated, $425,000, and there is hereby authorized and appropriated for the purposes specified herein the sum of $675,000: Provided further, That the tracts authorized to be acquired by this act shall become part of the park system of the District of Columbia and be under control of the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army: Provided further, That Cleveland Avenue from Thirty-fourth Street eastward to Thirty-third Place is hereby declared closed and the title thereto re-ceded to the owner of the abutting property by whom it was dedicated, in consideration of the dedication by the same owner of a larger area for widening and extension of Thirty-third Place, as shown by the map of Klinge Valley Park herein referred to.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President—

Mr. KING. I reserve the right to raise a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. PHIPPS. As relating to the Patterson tract, the Senate approved an item last year of $600,000 for the entire tract, in round figures, 80 acres of land. That provision went out in conference. The Senate subcommittee again visited the tract and, through the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds, Colonel Sherrill, were in touch with the owners of the Patterson estate, who, by the way, are not desirous of selling the property. It was found that we could work out a plan whereby the triangle nearest the railroad, the lowest ground and least desirable for park purposes, could be eliminated from the part that was to be taken, leaving 70 acres of desirable higher ground, and that by making that change in the entire tract we could acquire the property for $425,000. It comprises 70 acres. That is, in round figures, $6,000 an acre.

The owners of the property could utilize it to much better advantage, there is no doubt. It is in a section that is growing up. It is right near the city. It was Camp Meigs, and everyone knows what Camp Meigs was. It is beautiful-lying ground, and adjoining the asylum for the deaf and dumb.

The Klinge Valley tract, which it is proposed to take, would be a part of the connecting link between Rock Creek Park and Potomac Park. It is largely hilly, wooded ground, and yet there are no precipitous hillsides. They are such that people can walk over them, and they are undoubtedly available as park lands. Unless they are taken, and taken promptly, for park purposes, the lands are going to be used as a dump for filling material and built upon. Even now the amount that was originally proposed to be taken has been materially sheared down in area because of buildings encroaching on the park lands.

The same is true of the Piney Branch Park. There the recommendation covered in the bill is that we now take the minimum amount necessary to provide a proper entrance to the upper end of the park at Arkansas Avenue. The roadway would come in under the cement-arch bridge crossing Sixteenth Street at that point.

The three items are items which the committee feel very strongly should be approved at this time. If the properties are not acquired now, the chances are it will be impossible to acquire them later.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator whether Mr. Glover, whose interest in the parking system of the District has been very great, and whose recommendations, so far as I know, have been exceedingly wise, appeared before the committee or made any suggestions relative to either of the tracts?

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. Glover was not before our committee this year, but I have the information, I recall, from former hearings, that Mr. Glover favors the acquisition of the tracts.

Mr. BALL. I may say that I received a letter from Mr. Glover which I turned over to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. PHIPPS. Yes; we have a letter from Mr. Glover recommending the acquisitions. I will say in this connection that I know Mr. Glover has been instrumental with the owners of the property in inducing them to put minimum prices on their holdings.

Mr. KING. The judgment of Mr. Glover would be very persuasive with me, because in a public way and in a very disinterested way he has for many years devoted himself to the building up of a park system in the District. I think he is entitled to the thanks of the people here for his disinterested services.

However, as to the last proposition, I am not sure that Congress ought to acquire the land. At the expense of wearying the patience of the Senate for a moment, I want to call attention to a memorandum which has been handed to me dealing with the question. I ask the attention of the Senator in charge of the bill, so that if he regards any of the reasons as obstacles to the execution of his purpose he will so indicate.

In the first place, the appropriation, I understand, was not recommended by the Budget.

Mr. PHIPPS. Two of the items were not. The Patterson tract item was not. It was in our bill last year.

Mr. KING. But the Patterson tract has not been recommended by the Budget, nor has it been recommended by the commissioners.

Mr. PHIPPS. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that it was recommended by the Senate in Senate bill 3098, which passed this body on February 20, 1922. That act specified the Klinge Road Valley Park and Piney Branch Valley Park. In that case it gave 16.3 acres, where we now have cut it down to 8 acres. The Patterson tract, known as parcel 129, subdivision 2, containing 81.76 acres, was recommended. The commission was further authorized to acquire it, and the prices were given: Klinge Road, $186,800; Piney Branch, $237,700; and the Patterson tract, $600,000.

The same bill has been reported to the other House by the House committee, but the House has not yet taken action on it. The report made by Mr. Focht, of the District Committee, in the House was a favorable one and recommended the passage of the bill covering all three sites. So the matter has been acted on by the Senate and has received very careful consideration at the hands of the House committee.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, as I understand, the Budget Bureau did not approve of this item, nor did the commissioners, nor did the House of Representatives.

Mr. BALL. Mr. President—

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. BALL. The commissioners did approve of the bill in a letter which was written by them to the Senate committee.

Mr. KING. Let me say to the Senator that in the estimates for the fiscal year for 1924 the commissioners did not recommend the acquisition of the Patterson tract.

Mr. BALL. They recommended the acquisition of the Patterson tract to our committee before the bill was reported to the Senate, and the bill for that purpose has passed the Senate.

Mr. KING. But they did not appear before either the House committee or the Senate committee in the preparation of the pending bill and recommend the purchase of the Patterson tract.

Mr. BALL. That is true, but they were already on record as recommending it, from the fact that they had previously appeared before our committee in its behalf.

Mr. KING. At any rate, they did not appear before the Appropriations Committee, either of the House or of the Senate, nor does their testimony indicate that the commissioners approved of this appropriation.

The Senator has properly said that the owners of the Patterson tract, of which I am now speaking, are not favorable to the acquisition of that tract by the District. It has been stated to me—and I have only made a very imperfect investigation, so I have not any settled opinion of my own—that the acquisition of a part of the Patterson tract will permanently block the future industrial growth of the city in this region.

Mr. PHIPPS. Does the Senator from Utah desire me to answer the points he suggests as he goes along?

Mr. KING. Let me complete this statement, and then I shall be glad to yield to the Senator. The property practically adjoins the heart of the industrial locality of the city. It is close to the center of population and is the natural location for distributing warehouses, enabling them to provide minimum delivery charges to the consuming public. It abuts the railroad along its entire western and northern frontage. It is the only tract of appreciable size suited for future industrial development in that region.

Now, I shall be glad to have the Senator from Colorado make any comment he desires upon the views which I have just expressed.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, attention has been called to the fact that it is proposed to eliminate about 11.6 acres of the Patterson tract and take 70 acres. Those 11.6 acres constitute a triangle along the line of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad at New York Avenue. To set aside any more of the property adjoining the railroad on New York Avenue for sites for warehouses would not be practicable, on account of the contour of the ground. The ground rises rather rapidly 100 or 200 feet from Florida Avenue on one side, and New York Avenue crosses the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad by an overhead bridge; but, as New York Avenue is graded along the line of this property, to-day that bridge is standing up in the air and is not being used. This ground rises very rapidly from Florida Avenue to the crest of the hill. It adjoins the Columbia Deaf and Dumb Institution on the east, and the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad bounds it on the west.

Answering the Senator's other suggestion that there is no other ground available for warehouse sites, I will say that all that could be utilized for that purpose has been eliminated by the amendment and is not proposed to be acquired. The map clearly shows that the acquisition of the property as contemplated would not block development or the march of improvements in a northerly direction at that point.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, in view of the fact that the property abuts the railroad along its entire western and northern frontage, in view of the rapid growth of the city, and in view of its favorable location to the railroads and the evident necessity of further ground for industrial development, I most respectfully submit that the small part of the tract to which the Senator refers as having been eliminated from the purview of the amendment would not furnish adequate ground for industrial purposes, but that the entire tract is needed. I think the contention that it is the most available, if not the only available, tract for industrial development is one which is very appealing, and ought to cause Congress to hesitate before it embarks upon the expenditure of this huge sum.

Mr. President, there is another aspect to this question to which I desire to call the Senator's attention, namely, that, if the northeast section requires any additional park area at the present time, there is other land immediately available and at practically no expense. A large tract, of approximately 150 acres, abuts the Patterson tract on its entire eastern frontage. That tract is already partly owned and controlled by the Government and is largely maintained and supported by Federal appropriations. Much of the tract is used only for farm purposes, and a great deal of it is wooded and not used at all. If a park area is now required, the economical and practical measure would be the utilization for this purpose of the land already available and under Federal jurisdiction.

Mr. President, I have not investigated the facts regarding there being 150 acres available, but I know that there is a considerable tract of ground that is available for park purposes which is owned or controlled entirely by the Federal Government. I yield to the Senator from Colorado if he cares to make any observations in regard to that statement.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, the map which I showed the Senator also indicates the property on which the Columbia Institution for the Deaf and Dumb is located, and the estimate of 150 acres of ground is certainly entirely too high. There is not that great an acreage; I think it has about the same area as the Patterson tract, or approximately eighty-odd acres. A good part of that could and should be utilized as a park in connection with the proposed acquisition; but unless we acquire the Patterson tract, so far as we are able to see there is no land within the next 2 miles that would serve as a park for the northeast section of the city.

Mr. BALL. And that section has no park now.

Mr. PHIPPS. As the Senator from Delaware suggests, there is no park there now and there is no place where playgrounds can be located. If we could secure this piece of ground it would certainly eliminate the necessity of providing two or three playgrounds. As a matter of fact, when we had the appropriation bill under consideration last year and put in this item, we struck out two items for playgrounds in the north-east section. Unless this property is acquired within the very near future it is going to be impossible to secure it at all.

Mr. KING. I inquire of the Senator why not make use of the tract of land already controlled by the Government—whether it is 150 acres, as I have stated, or 80 or 90 acres, as the Senator suggests—for playground purposes and for park purposes instead of buying the Patterson tract at such a very large figure?

Mr. PHIPPS. I think even if we did not to-day own the ground around the Columbia Institution for the Deaf, and it were another piece of property contiguous to the Patterson tract, that the right thing to do would be to buy them both and not go half way.

I feel that the price at which the property can be acquired is, indeed, reasonable. We all know that the owners could undoubtedly take that property and develop it and sell it to much better advantage. We are getting a decrease in the price more than proportionate to the area eliminated by not including in the amendment provision for acquiring the lower area of ground adjoining the railroads.

If I gave the Senator the impression that the railway bounded the northerly side of the property, I did not mean to do so. The northerly boundary is New York Avenue and not the railroad property. The property is bounded on what I take to be its northerly side by New York Avenue, and the railway runs along but a very small portion of the frontage of the property. In any event, the item should be put in the bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I dislike very much to raise a point of order. If the Senator will divide the amendment as I think it should be divided, so that we may vote upon the first two projects, I shall be glad to do that. I ask that the amendment may be divided.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I do not understand on what the Senator would base a point of order as to the provision with reference to the Patterson tract. The opinion of the Senate has already been expressed by the passage of Senate bill 3080, to which I have called the Senator's attention.

Mr. KING. First, the item has not been estimated for by the Budget Bureau and it is not in the House bill.

Mr. PHIPPS. But it has been reported by the standing committee, and the committee has authority so to report.

Mr. KING. I do not understand that under the new rule even the report of a standing committee of an item for an appropriation would render it immune from attack upon the ground that it is not proper legislation on an appropriation bill under the circumstances that surround this bill. It is conceded that this item—I am speaking of the last one now, the appropriation for the Patterson tract—was not estimated for by the Budget Bureau; it was not recommended to the House by the Appropriations Committee of that body, and the House did not make any provision for it. So far as this bill is concerned the amendment is initiated by the committee and comes to the floor of the Senate without the approval of the Budget Bureau and without the approval of the House. I raise the point of order against the provision in the amendment covering the Patterson tract because it has not been estimated for by the Budget Bureau and is in contravention of the rules of the Senate.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I want to suggest that it is reported by a standing committee of the Senate, as the rules provide.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is of the opinion that this does not come within the prohibition, having been reported from a standing committee of the Senate.

Mr. KING. I ask for a division of the amendment. The Chair will see that there are really three amendments there.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I recognize the justice of the Senator's request. There is no objection to having them treated separately. Let us take Piney Branch and Klinge Road and the Patterson tract separately.

Mr. KING. As far as I am concerned, I have no objection to the first two, and will vote for those two. I desire to have the Patterson tract voted on separately.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the Klinge Valley and Piney Branch portions of the amendment.

The amendment indicated was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Now the question recurs on the Patterson tract portion of the amendment.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator leave the vote upon that until just before we recess? I do not want to call for a quorum, and if for any reason the matter should go over until to-morrow morning I should be glad. I shall not ask that it go over until to-morrow morning if the bill can be concluded to-night, however.

Mr. PHIPPS. We should like very much to conclude the bill to-night; but certainly there is no objection to postponing action on this particular amendment until we have cleaned up other matters with relation to the bill, even if it does have to go over.

Mr. KING. I do not want to put the Senate to the trouble of calling for a quorum if I can avoid it.

Mr. JONES of Washington subsequently said: Mr. President, when the amendment with reference to the purchase of park land was under consideration and the question was raised as to whether or not the provision as to the purchase of the Patterson tract was in order, I stated to the Chair that it had been reported to the Senate by a standing committee of the Senate. I think I ought to say that I did that, of course, on the spur of the moment; but, as a matter of fact, it was presented by the Senator from Colorado by authority of the committee, the committee feeling that on account of the doubt about it being in order it ought not to be reported as a committee amendment, thereby endangering the bill and possibly leading to its recommitment to the committee. The committee was in favor of it, but it was not proposed as a committee amendment. Under the new rule, I think the committee could not do that unless the Chair should hold that, independent of that, it would be in order upon the bill.

I thought that I ought to make this statement so that it might be in the RECORD when the question comes up to-morrow for a vote and possibly a reconsideration of the ruling on the point of order.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKellar] has the floor.

Mr. McKellar. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. I suggest that the statement just made by the Senator from Washington has a very material bearing upon the ruling made by the Chair with reference to the question. It appears that the amendment was not moved by direction of a standing committee, and therefore the amendment should be treated as an individual amendment not estimated for.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, there is one further amendment, on page 97, after line 24, providing for a permanent system of highway surveys. I ask to have the amendment stated. It is new matter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 97, after the amendment agreed to at that place, it is proposed to insert the following:

The Commissioners of the District of Columbia under the authority of the act of Congress of March 2, 1893 (27 Stats., p. 532), providing for a permanent system of highways for the District of Columbia, are hereby authorized and directed to make a complete restudy of the highway system of the District of Columbia outside of the built-up portions of the District and outside of the limits of the old city of Washington, with a view to the location of the highways in accordance with the best city planning practice and with a view to maintaining the natural topographical features—hills, valleys, and wooded areas—as far as may be practicable, and such map as may be produced in accordance with this authority shall be submitted to the commission created by the above act of March 2, 1893, for its amendment or approval: Provided further, That no change of location of the roadways shall be made in any built-up subdivision, but changes of location as may be necessary in any unsubdivided areas or in subdivided areas unbuilt up may be made. There is hereby appropriated for this purpose the sum of $50,000 for the payment of salaries of technical and clerical employees, the purchase of the necessary materials, and labor.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, a word of explanation.

When the plans for the old city, as we know it, were adopted they provided for regular squares and blocks, and then streets running on diagonals, with resultant circles, in different parts of the city. Then extension was made over as far as Georgetown, and the streets and avenues in the old city were projected on through the newer portions. As they were built up and became occupied further and additional property was brought in, additions were tacked on and laid out on the same plan of intersecting streets at right angles and at acute angles and all kinds of angles. To improve or build up any section of that outlying district, the owners to-day have to take into account the plan which is before them, and that requires the roads to go straight through on certain lines. The contour of the country may be such as to make it almost impossible, or, at least, unduly expensive, to continue those avenues along straight lines to connect up with those now established; and it not only means undue expenditure on the part of the property owners and the home builders but it necessarily entails added and unnecessary expense on the city government in order to make the cuts and fills to carry out the grades that should be provided.

I may cite Connecticut Avenue as an instance of what I mean. Some of the cuts and fills there are greater than should be necessary, because to-day we have the automobile and the trolley car, and the road over the hill is not so objectionable as when we relied on horse-drawn vehicles. In some sections, however, instead of the avenue being projected on a straight line, a curve may be resorted to that will preserve proper contours and give passable grades, and at the same time save a great amount of expense for the home builder and the city as well.

Therefore your committee feels justified in recommending that a comprehensive topographical survey be made, so that it may be determined what changes should be made at this time in the projected streets where the property has not yet been built up, and we feel that it should meet the support of the Senate.

Mr. KING. It is a good idea.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado on behalf of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PHIPPS. That completes the amendments in which the committee is interested, with the exception of one reserved for the final vote by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING].

Now, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKellar] if we may have action on the items reserved for his consideration?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I wish to say that on yesterday, after the colloquy in reference to automobiles occurred here in the Senate, I telephoned to the secretary of one of the commissioners, Mr. Oyster, and he informed me that a statement would be prepared as to the number of automobiles and sent up to me either yesterday afternoon or early this morning. I have not heard from them at all further; but I find in the afternoon News this statement:

Full details on the use of District automobiles will be sent to the Senate within two days to answer charges of Senator McKELLAR yesterday that Government autos were used for private purposes, Daniel E. Garges, secretary of the commission, said to-day.

So I assume from this statement, if it is correct, that the figures will not be sent until after this bill is passed. I imagine that they will wait carefully until the two days are out and the bill is passed, and then they will send up the figures. Of course, if the city commission wishes to withhold those figures, it can do so; but there is no reason in the world why they should not have been sent. Whoever talked to me over the telephone yesterday afternoon said that they would be sent right away. I have had nothing further from them; so that there is but one thing for us to do, and that is to vote on my amendment to strike out these provisions about automobiles.

If the majority of the Senate think that this kind of practice may continue to be indulged in, and that it is the duty of the Government to appropriate these large sums for the maintenance of passenger-carrying automobiles, of course I am going to take my medicine like a man, and say no more about it for the present; but I serve notice here now that during the next six years, whenever these appropriation bills come up, I am going to protest against this wasteful and useless extravagance in the matter of passenger-carrying automobiles being used by the various officials of the Government. There are found in this bill innumerable places where automobiles are provided for, and in other places the upkeep and operation of automobiles is provided for.

As long as our Republican majority desire to keep that up, of course they have the votes over there, and can do it; but I do hope that enough economists will come to the front at some time to stop this practice, which is little short of a scandal.

Really, the way it is being done now is little short of a public scandal, and I regret that the city commissioners are not sufficiently considerate of the Senate to send these figures up here before a vote is taken. Of course, those officials knew that the consideration of the bill was in progress and that it was desired to finish it at an early date.

I am not going to ask the Senate to postpone the vote on this matter until to-morrow, because I know it would be a useless thing. The commission would not send up the figures until the next day if we were to postpone it until to-morrow. So, Mr. President, I am going to ask for a vote on one provision, or we might vote on all of them in bloc, if that is satisfactory to the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to voting on them in bloc? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. KING. Let them be stated first.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, before the vote is taken I should like to give an opportunity for the offering of other amendments. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL] has an amendment that I have asked him to withhold until this time, and I think there may be some others.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator is not ready to vote on this amendment now?

Mr. PHIPPS. I should prefer to have these other smaller amendments considered first.

Mr. McKELLAR. I judged from what the Senator had stated to me that all the other amendments had been disposed of, or I would not have brought up this matter.

Mr. BALL. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 47, line 2, in the item relative to Americanization work, it is proposed to strike out "$6,480" in the House text and to insert in lieu thereof "$9,980."

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, let us have an explanation of that.

Mr. KING. I should like some explanation from the Senator in regard to this item.

Mr. BALL. Mr. President, what does the Senator wish to know? It was not estimated for by the Budget.

Mr. KING. It is not estimated for and not allowed by the House nor by the Senate committee?

Mr. BALL. It is the same appropriation that was granted last year. There is a deficiency of $4,500. I will state to the Senator that the deficiency is recommended by the Budget for this year, and it is to be allowed, under the bill, as I understand. Perhaps the chairman of the committee can give the Senator some further information about it.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, Americanization work is largely night-school work, though there are some day classes. The appropriation for the present year has been found to be inadequate, and unless a deficiency is allowed, the night schools will have to stop the 1st of April, instead of carrying along through April, May, and June, as it is desired they should do. The Budget is recommending $4,500 as a deficiency for this year, I am informed, and while the Committee on Appropriations was not given an opportunity to consider this additional item of $3,500, since it has been brought to my attention I have spoken to as many of the members as I can reach, and I find that they do not object to the inclusion of the item, and to carrying it to conference, so that the activity may be properly cared for, rather than have a deficiency again this year.

Mr. KING. Under whose auspices is this money expended?

Mr. PHIPPS. Under the auspices of the Board of Education; but they have collaborated with the Department of Labor for a time, and I think even yet the Department of Labor runs a day school in the department building. The work is most important. There was a provision in the bill as it went to the House this year, attempting to exclude people over 21 years of age, unless they paid tuition. That is one item the Senate committee did not favor. We think the amount included in this one item in the bill, $6,480, is really insufficient. It ought to be about $10,000, or, as they have it, $9,980.

Mr. HARRISON. How many teachers are there doing this Americanization work? I notice the appropriation is to pay for a principal, $1,800 a year, and janitors and teachers. How many teachers are there employed in that work? The language of the bill as it passed the House is:

For Americanization work and instruction of foreigners of all ages in both day and night classes, including a principal, who, for 10 months, shall give his full time to this work, at $1,800 per annum, and teachers and janitors of Americanization schools may also be teachers and janitors of the day school, $6,480.

Mr. PHIPPS. This year they had $12,000, and the estimate they are submitting is for $6,480. The saving was accomplished by the transfer of five teachers, or the work of five teachers was put under another heading, as I recall it.

Mr. HARRISON. They are not paid out of this sum, then?

Mr. PHIPPS. They are not paid out of this sum, but we have granted permission to the teachers who teach during the day in the regular day school to teach these night classes. We provide for vocational trade instructors and teachers of Americanization work. That number, I think, has been segregated. I did have the number, but at the moment I can not find the memorandum.

Mr. HARRISON. There are five teachers doing this work, in addition to the principal.

Mr. PHIPPS. I think there must be more than that number, because most of them are employed only at night. I am sorry I can not furnish the Senator with more information at this time; but my suggestion would be to allow this item to go to conference, and then we can go into it and fully study it.

Mr. HARRISON. This is an important proposition. I do not know how much we appropriate for the Department of Labor for Americanization work, but it is quite a sum. We have been cutting it down in recent years, but it is quite important.

This bill should be rushed along as speedily as possible, and I think progress on the bill has been very speedy. I think it is a very splendid bill, taken as a whole, and the Senators who have drafted the Senate committee bill have done a wonderful work; but, in the interest of speeding it up, can not the Senator suggest that, say, to-morrow at 2 o'clock all debate shall close upon this bill, and in the meantime we can decide on the amendments?

Mr. PHIPPS. I do not see that it should be necessary to carry this bill over until to-morrow. We have only two items in dispute.

Mr. HARRISON. I make the suggestion because the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] has an amendment pending touching the purchase of some land somewhere, and the Senator from Tennessee is framing one amendment and has another amendment to be voted on, and there is this great work of Americanization to be considered. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS], I understand, has a very important amendment to offer. So we can speed it up by fixing a definite time to stop debate and vote upon the proposition. Just in the interest of the economy of time I suggested that at 2 o'clock to-morrow all debate close.

Mr. PHIPPS. Of course, we could include that in the motion to recess, and I understand from other Senators interested that 1 o'clock to-morrow would be acceptable.

Mr. HARRISON. Just let us fix some definite time, so that we will get through with the bill.

Mr. PHIPPS. I suggest to the Senator in charge of the unfinished business, then, that he incorporate that understanding in the agreement to recess to-night.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, another Senator has said he desires to offer some amendments, and that he might discuss them somewhat. If the Senate will agree to close debate on the bill and all amendments at 1 o'clock to-morrow, I am willing that the Senate shall recess until 12 o'clock.

Mr. KING. We will agree to that.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, we may possibly get the figures from the District Commissioners by morning, and I think only an hour would be a very short time, because I have another amendment I want to offer.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am willing that the Senate shall recess until 11 o'clock, then.

Mr. McKELLAR. Let us recess until 12 and vote at 2. I am sure that will give us ample time.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not think we ought to do that.

Mr. McKELLAR. I wish to say, in regard to meeting at 11 o'clock, that we met at 11 o'clock this morning, and it took exactly 21 minutes by the clock to get a quorum. I think it is a bad practice to meet at 11 o'clock. I do not believe much time is gained by it. I do not know what arrangements have been made about the time. It will take me but a very short time to submit the two amendments I have.

Mr. KING. Let me say to my friend from Tennessee that the amendment which I shall offer will take but a few moments, and he can have half an hour.

Mr. McKELLAR. I joined in an agreement to vote on a bill at a certain time the other day, and some other Senator took all the time; and I did not have an opportunity to present what I desired to submit. I think 15 minutes will be all the time I shall want to consume to-morrow. Let us make the time of meeting 1.30 o'clock.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Let me suggest to the Senator that he get recognition to-night and occupy the floor in the morning. Then he can present the matter and have his 15 minutes.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I understand of course that it is possible for Senators to agree on how they will parcel out the time, but I have an amendment which I think is of some importance. I am perfectly willing to go on with it now; but if Senators are to join in an understanding that the time is to be divided up to-morrow, I want it understood that I have an amendment that I desire to offer. I am perfectly willing to proceed with it to-night.

Mr. McKELLAR. I hope the Senator from Washington will make the hour of meeting to-morrow 12 o'clock.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Let us go on this evening and finish as much as we can, and then try to get agreement directly.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL]. The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I desire to call up an amendment offered by me on yesterday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 68, line 4, after the word "officers" insert: "Director probation department, $2,400."

On page 68, line 6, after the figures "$1,500" insert: "Case supervisor, at $1,800; two probation officers, at $1,400 each."

On page 68, line 10, after the figures "$1,200" insert: "Stenographer, at $1,200."

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I regret to call the Senator's attention to the fact that this is an item that has not been estimated for, it has not been approved by the Budget, and has not been reported by a standing committee. The Senate subcommittee working on the bill heard the judge of the juvenile court and called her attention to those facts, and later, in personal conferences, I called the attention of the judge to the fact that these very activities are provided for under the Board of Children's Guardians, and it was merely a technical question whether the work that it was suggested should be done by the officers now proposed in this amendment was not being done by the people we are already paying to do the work. I shall have to make a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I desire to be heard on the point of order.

Mr. MOSES. May I ask the Senator from Colorado, in connection with the point of order, whether probation officers are not estimated for and reported?

Mr. PHIPPS. These are not.

Mr. MOSES. Then it is a mere question of terminology, and the Senator from Ohio can change the language so as to authorize the appointment of additional probation officers.

Mr. PHIPPS. They are not known as probation officers in the place where they are provided for; they are known as investigating and placing officers.

Mr. MOSES. The Senator can change it so as to provide for additional probation officers, can he not?

Mr. PHIPPS. No.

Mr. MOSES. Why not?

Mr. PHIPPS. Because they are not estimated for.

Mr. MOSES. I would like to know very definitely if the situation here in the Senate is such that a Budget Bureau or a committee is going to shackle the Senate if it wishes to increase the number of officers already named in a bill, or if we want to appoint an extra clerk.

Mr. LODGE. It could not be done under the old rules, even before there was a Budget Bureau.

Mr. MOSES. We have always done it.

Mr. LODGE. Not if it had not been reported by a standing committee.

Mr. MOSES. We have frequently increased the number of officers provided for in a bill.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; if there was a majority of the Senate in favor of it.

Mr. MOSES. That is the question before the Senate now, or will be before we get through with this matter.

Mr. LODGE. It could not be done without a committee recommendation first.

Mr. MOSES. We will find out whether a majority of the Senate will stand for this.

Mr. LODGE. I meant to say that a majority of the Senate could do it, after a committee had reported it.

Mr. MOSES. I understand that.

Mr. LODGE. If there was no report from a standing committee, it was out of order under the old rule.

Mr. MOSES. Then, Mr. President, we have to override a point of order plainly raised, in order to do something that the Senate wants to do and which ought to be done?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair would like to be informed as to whether it has been estimated for.

Mr. MOSES. These particular additional officers, I understand, have not been estimated for, but if it is the judgment of the Senate that there should be more of them, is the Senate to be denied the right to name them?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair would like to know further whether there is any doubt that the amendment would increase the appropriation?

Mr. PHIPPS. It undoubtedly would increase the amount of the appropriation.

Mr. WILLIS. Undoubtedly it would increase the appropriation, but I should like to be heard before the Chair rules.

Mr. PHIPPS. There are no employees of any of the three classes designated in the amendment who are employed under the particular activity to which the amendment is proposed, the juvenile court.

Mr. FLETCHER. Not only is that true, but it increases the number of employees and, being in the same department, it necessarily increases the appropriation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will hear the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, there is no doubt, of course, that the amendment would increase the appropriation. It increases the number of employees and therefore increases the appropriation. But my contention is that it is in conformity with an authorization already made in conformity with existing law. I have before me the estimate of the Budget, at page 941 of which appears the heading "Probation officers," and it goes on, then, with the different items under that heading. If there is no authority of law for the officials which I am proposing in my amendment, there is no authority of law for those already in the bill, so far as that is concerned. The amendment is to carry out a provision of existing law.

In order that there may be no misunderstanding about the purpose of the amendment, let me call attention to the fact that its purpose is to save the children and the homes and the money of the taxpayers all at once. Here is the situation:

As it stands now, a child is brought up before the juvenile court because of delinquency. It develops that the home is not a proper home. As it is proposed to be carried out, if the amendment shall be defeated, the only thing the court could do would be to commit the child to the Board of Guardians. Now it is proposed by the creation of these additional offices to give authority not only to put the child, as it were, on probation but to put the home on probation as well.

The natural instinct of the parent, which ought to have some consideration, will prompt the parents to say, "Let us take the child back home." That is all right, if the court has sufficient officers to enable it to supervise the home. That makes it possible to keep the child in the home and to keep from breaking up the home. I should prefer that a child be kept in a home, even an indifferent one, rather than to have it put in a public institution.

Furthermore, when the child is in the home the public is relieved of the burden of caring for it, and that is at least $1 a day. The amendment would save the taxpayers money, the child, and the home. It is a matter which carries out the terms of existing law. I insist that the amendment is in order.

Mr. MOSES. May I ask the Senator from Ohio if the effect of the amendment is contrary to what has been stated, namely, to increase the amount of the appropriation, but that we would save money by it?

Mr. WILLIS. Without any question.

Mr. PHIPPS. I desire to correct a statement I made inadvertently. I said the probation officers were not included in the activity under which the amendment was proposed. That was an incorrect statement. They are so included.

The VICE PRESIDENT. What does the Senator from Ohio say is the provision of existing law which he proposes to carry out by his amendment?

Mr. WILLIS. I understand that the law now authorizes an appropriation for probation officers as estimated for in the Budget. There is no doubt about that. The law now provides for that. The amendment proposes to increase the number of officers. There is no question about that, and therefore it will increase the appropriation to that extent. But, as has been pointed out by the Senator from New Hampshire, without doubt it will save the public funds, because it would cost less to have one official to supervise 25 children in their own homes, where the public is relieved of the burden of supporting them, than it would to have those children put in public institutions.

I contend that the amendment is to carry out the terms of existing law, and therefore is in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not understand the rule in accordance with the suggestion made by the Senator from Ohio. It would seem to the Chair that the Senator is undertaking to make some existing law and then provide an appropriation to meet it. Therefore the Chair rules that the point of order is well taken.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I have sent to the Secretary's desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 10, after line 22, insert the following proviso.

Provided, That the appropriation in this section shall not become available until the Public Utilities Commission shall fix rates of fare for the street railway companies in the District of Columbia at rates not in excess of the rates of fare fixed in existing charters or contracts heretofore entered into between said companies and the Congress, and, on and after February 1, 1923, said companies shall receive a rate of fare not exceeding 5 cents per passenger, and six tickets shall be sold for 25 cents.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President—

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate conclude its business to-day it recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow, and that all debate on the pending bill and amendments close at 1 o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Washington? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The agreement was reduced to writing, as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business to-day it will take a recess until 12 o'clock meridian, calendar day of Thursday, January 25, 1923, and that at not later than 1 o'clock p. m. on said calendar day all debate shall cease on the bill H. R. 13660 and all amendments offered thereto.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR], on which that Senator is entitled to the floor.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, having heard the reading of the amendment, and speaking to the amendment, I regret that I shall have to make a point of order against the amendment that it is legislation upon an appropriation bill and therefore out of order.

Mr. McKELLAR. I differ with the Senator. It is strictly a limitation upon the appropriation made in the bill. It is not legislation; it is merely a limitation upon an appropriation. Is the Senator ready to take a recess now? Can not this matter go over until to-morrow?

Mr. PHIPPS. I am quite willing to let it go over if the Senator prefers.

Mr. McKELLAR. I desire to look up the authorities between now and to-morrow noon, and I hope the Senator, if the Senate is going to take a recess in a few moments, will permit the amendment to go over.

Mr. PHIPPS. That is agreeable to me.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Will the Senator from Tennessee yield to me?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

COLUMBIA RIVER BRIDGE, OREGON.

Mr. JONES of Washington. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably with amendments the bill (S. 4341) granting the consent of Congress to the Oregon-Washington Bridge Co. and its successors to construct a toll bridge across the Columbia River at or near the city of Hood River, Ore., and I submit a report (No. 1056) thereon. I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendments were, on page 1, lines 9 and 10, to strike out the words "and that the time for the commencement and completion of such bridge," and, on page 2, line 2, after the numerals "1906," to strike out "shall be commenced within one year and completed within three years, respectively, from the date of approval hereof," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the Oregon-Washington Bridge Co., a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Washington, and its successors, to construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge and approaches thereto across the Columbia River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation at or near the city of Hood River, Ore., in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BERTHA N. RICH.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 4114) for the relief of Bertha N. Rich. I do not think it will take very long to pass the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. DIAL. I have looked into the measure, and it will involve some considerable discussion. Therefore I shall have to object to taking it up at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is objection.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Do I understand that the Senator from South Carolina objects to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. DIAL. At the present time. It would involve considerable discussion, and I would not like to detain the Senate at this late hour.

FOX RIVER BRIDGES.

Mr. JONES of Washington. For the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER], I report two bridge bills, in which the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCKINLEY] is interested, and I shall ask for their immediate consideration.

I report favorably with amendments the bill (S. 4353) granting the consent of Congress to the highway commissioner of the town of Elgin, Kane County, Ill., to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Fox River, and I submit a report (No. 1057) thereon. I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendments were, on page 1, line 11, to strike out the numerals "1908" and insert "1906," and on page 2 to strike out lines 1, 2, 3, and 4, in the following words:

SEC. 2. That said highway commissioner of the town of Elgin, be, and is hereby, further authorized and empowered to construct all necessary abutments, piers, and other structures for the accomplishment of this end.

And to renumber the section in line 5, so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the highway commissioner of the town of Elgin, situated in the county of Kane and State of Illinois, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Fox River in substantially a direct line, connecting Mill Street on the east side of the river with Spring Street on the west side of the river, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I report back favorably, with amendments from the Committee on Commerce, the bill (S. 4169) granting the consent of Congress to the city of Aurora, Kane County, Ill., a municipal corporation, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Fox River, and I submit a report (No. 1058) thereon. I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendments were, on page 2, to strike out lines 3 to 11, inclusive, in the following words:

SEC. 2. That said city of Aurora be, and it is hereby, further authorized and empowered to construct all necessary abutments, piers, and other structures for the accomplishment of this end, and to move, change, and reconstruct the existing dam, if necessary.

SEC. 3. That the authority empowered to construct said bridge and to initiate and consummate the actual erection of said bridge shall exist for a period of five years from and after the date of the passage thereof—and to renumber the section in line 12, so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the city of Aurora, a municipal corporation situated in the county of Kane and State of Illinois, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the west branch of the Fox River, reaching from Stolps Island to the mainland and connecting the west end of Main Street with the east end of Galena Street in said city, county, and State, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I inquire of the Senator if these are free bridges?

Mr. MCKINLEY. They are bridges just within the limits of the city of Aurora.

Mr. FLETCHER. Not toll bridges?

Mr. MCKINLEY. Not toll bridges.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PRICE OF ANTHRACITE COAL.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I submit a resolution and ask for its immediate consideration. It simply seeks for information from the Interstate Commerce Commission, and I do not think it will lead to debate.

The resolution (S. Res. 418) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Whereas it has been reported that large shipments of anthracite coal are being made from the United States to foreign countries, and that such coal is being sold at retail in foreign countries at prices considerably below the retail selling price of anthracite coal in the United States; and

Whereas in the present national emergency the inadequate supply of anthracite coal makes it imperative that the fuel requirements of the United States be first met; and

Whereas the Interstate Commerce Commission has authority under section 2 of the act entitled "An act to declare a national emergency to exist in the production, transportation, and distribution of coal and other fuel, granting additional powers to the Interstate Commerce Commission, providing for the appointment of a Federal fuel distributor, providing for the declaration of car-service priorities during the present emergency, and to prevent the sale of fuel at unjust and unreasonably high prices," approved September 22, 1922, to order an embargo on all shipments of anthracite coal to foreign countries until the national emergency declared by such act has been terminated: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Interstate Commerce Commission is directed to report to the Senate (1) whether it has investigated the feasibility and advisability of ordering an embargo upon shipments of anthracite coal to foreign countries; (2) the action taken as a result of such investigation, if one has been made, together with the facts considered and the conclusions reached by the commission; (3) if no investigation has been made, whether such an investigation should not be immediately instituted to determine the feasibility and advisability of ordering such an embargo; and (4) what "other necessary and appropriate steps for the priority in transportation and equitable distribution of coal" (anthracite) have been taken "to prevent upon the part of any person, partnership, association, or corporation the purchase or sale of coal (anthracite) at prices unjustly or unreasonably high."

REGULATION OF MOTOR-VEHICLE OPERATORS.

Mr. BALL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 4283) to authorize the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to require operators of motor vehicles in the District of Columbia to secure a permit, and for other purposes.

Mr. MCKELLAR. What is the nature of the bill?

Mr. BALL. It is a bill giving the Commissioners of the District authority to annul licenses to operate automobiles under certain conditions.

Mr. LODGE. They ought to have the power to withdraw licenses from motor operators under certain conditions.

Mr. BALL. If the Senator from Tennessee will permit me, I believe I can explain conditions so that he will know that action is required. At present the law provides that for certain offenses certain fines and imprisonment shall be imposed.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Let us have the bill reported.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

The reading clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized and empowered to require operators of all motor vehicles in the District of Columbia to obtain a permit under such regulations as said commissioners may deem necessary; and said commissioners are hereby authorized and empowered to make, modify, and enforce all such regulations as they may deem necessary for licensing operators of motor vehicles in the District of Columbia, and to refuse or revoke any such permit after hearing by said commissioners, when for any reason in their judgment the issuance or continuance of such permit would be a menace to public safety: Provided, That nothing herein contained, or in the regulations of the commissioners made hereunder, shall be deemed to repeal the provisions of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1917, concerning the operation of motor vehicles in the District of Columbia by persons not legal residents of said District who have complied with the laws of the State of their legal residence, except, however, that the operation of motor vehicles in the District of Columbia by persons not legal residents or domiciled therein may be forbidden under like conditions as above set forth for resident operators.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, as I understand, if this bill shall become a law the Commissioners of the District of Columbia will have the right to revoke an operator's license, whether it be issued by the city of Washington or in some other jurisdiction.

Mr. BALL. The bill provides for the revocation of a driver's license under certain conditions.

Mr. MCKELLAR. If the bill, if enacted, will have the effect of aiding in preventing so many accidents in this city, if it has that purpose, I am willing that it shall be passed.

Mr. BALL. If the Senator desires, I will cite a case or two, although I understand he has withdrawn his objection to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I have already withdrawn my objection to the consideration of the bill, but I shall be very glad to hear the Senator from Delaware if he desires to make a statement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I have been engaged in conversation, endeavoring to ascertain the effect of this bill, and, owing to my own fault, have not been able to do so. I wish the Senator from Delaware would once more explain the bill. I regret making this request of him.

Mr. BALL. Mr. President, the bill provides that the Commissioners of the District of Columbia may, under certain conditions, revoke the permits of operators of motor vehicles in the District of Columbia. It permits operators who are driving automobiles under permits issued by the States to do so, unless, of course, they should commit certain offenses, in which case the Commissioners of the District would have the right to revoke their permits, so far as operating in the District of Columbia is concerned only. If the Senator from New York will permit me, I desire to say that the concrete case which brought the attention of the Commissioners of the District to this matter was an accident which occurred a few weeks ago as the result of an intoxicated man operating an automobile. The commissioners attempted to annul his permit, but it was decided that he could only be fined and imprisoned, and he was fined and imprisoned in that case; but immediately he operated his car again and within a week was again arrested for intoxication. The commissioners again attempted to annul his permit, and they did take his District permit away from him, but he went over into Virginia and secured a permit there, as he was doing business in that State, and he continued to operate the car. Within two weeks, however, while driving his automobile when intoxicated he ran over a child. The commissioners appealed to the court, but the court decided that there was no authority for annulling a permit granted by another State.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I wish to ask the Senator from Delaware a question. Assuming that a person is operating an automobile in the District of Columbia and is not a resident of the District of Columbia but a resident of a State which does not require an operator's license, what power would the District Commissioners, under the terms of this bill, have over such a driver?

Mr. BALL. Under the terms of the bill, I would say that they would probably have a right to require such an operator to take out a permit here.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Is it not true that licenses relate to the car?

Mr. BALL. The bill refers to operators' permits. At present, Mr. President, the District Commissioners have absolutely no control over operators, except they may be imprisoned upon conviction.

Mr. FLETCHER. Do I understand the chairman of the committee to say that this bill has been considered by the District Committee and unanimously reported by the committee?

Mr. BALL. The bill was prepared by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, but it has been considered by the Committee on the District of Columbia and reported unanimously.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Do I understand it to be a fact that if this bill shall be passed every person driving a car in the District of Columbia must have an operator's permit, whether he be a legal resident or a nonresident temporarily domiciled here?

Mr. BALL. I asked one of the District Commissioners that question last evening, and he told me that it would not interfere with those operating cars who come here from States, unless they drive while intoxicated or become involved in accidents, but that then they might afterwards be compelled to operate under a District permit.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Then it is discretionary with the District Commissioners?

Mr. BALL. It is discretionary with the District Commissioners.

Mr. WADSWORTH. And they could under this bill, if passed, require everyone to take out a District permit?

Mr. BALL. To take out a permit to operate cars. There is such a law now, but it is not compulsory.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. There is a reciprocal law here.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The point of the matter is, as I read this bill—although I may be wrong about it—that this is one of those measures which pyramid the number of licenses to which the humble citizen is subjected. As I read the bill a person domiciled here, although not a legal resident, may be compelled to take out an operator's permit to drive a car which is not registered here, although he is compelled to take out a license in another State and may be obliged to secure licenses in several States. I am opposed to such a pyramiding of permits upon people who are not residents of the District of Columbia.

Mr. BALL. My construction of the bill is that the Commissioners of the District of Columbia may compel an operator to secure a permit and that they would have control over that permit in the future.

Mr. WADSWORTH. We are having exactly the same kind of a situation in reference to the taxes on motor vehicles. In some instances several States have tried to tax the same automobile. The State of Maryland is trying to do it now on District of Columbia automobiles, pyramiding license costs. I wish to know whether this bill will have the effect of pyramiding operators' costs?

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not see how that could happen, but it looks to me as though a person ought to be required to have a permit to operate a car in the District of Columbia, whether that car is owned by a citizen of some State or whether the owner is a resident of the District of Columbia.

Mr. WADSWORTH. If that is correct, Mr. President, then the District of Columbia should also charge a license fee for a New York car which is operated in the District.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not know that they need charge for it, but a permit ought to be required.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That would be the consistent and logical thing to do, and I am opposed to it.

Mr. McKELLAR. The commissioners ought to be in a position to revoke a license if the operator of a car is drunk or is otherwise unfit to operate it.

Mr. BALL. I feel that unless we are going to grant the commissioners some authority over those who operate motor vehicles in this city, they will not be able to control accidents.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the bill should be passed and become a law and should not work properly Congress would still have the power to repeal it or change it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I do not intend to adopt obstructive tactics, but I think this bill is of more importance than some of the Senators supporting it realize. I am opposed to its consideration at this time. I do not know whether I am too late in making the objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York can interpose objection at any time.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Then I object to the consideration of the bill at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

EUGENE FAZZI.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield to me?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of Order of Business No. 951, being the bill (H. R. 3461) for the relief of Eugene Fazzi.

Mr. McKELLAR. What is the purpose of the bill?

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I do not wish to object to considering the bill, but I submit it is a very bad practice just as we are about to adjourn to be taking up bills on the calendar. Not one-fourth of the Senators are present, and I think it a bad practice to consider bills under such circumstances.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I agree with the Senator, but there are on the calendar several bills which affect my State which have been reported from the Claims Committee, and naturally I am anxious that they should be considered and passed. I am merely trying to take advantage of the opportunity to have the bills acted upon. Unimportant bills are frequently presented and considered toward the close of a session of the Senate. I do not think the Senator will object to the bill when he understands it, and I do not want to delay him and keep him here.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not know what the bill is, and I should like to accommodate the Senator, but I think it would be much better if he would ask that it be taken up to-morrow.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Will the Senator consent to the consideration of this one bill?

Mr. FLETCHER. I would prefer that the Senator let it go over until to-morrow.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. LODGE. I move the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened; and (at 5 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate, under the order previously made, took a recess until to-morrow, Thursday, January 25, 1923, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 24, 1923.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon and was called to order by the Speaker.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Heavenly Father, be merciful unto us; forgive us our sins and help us to start the day with good cheer, hope, and courage. In our unwisdom and lack of knowledge may the fundamental principles of right and wrong be fulfilled in our daily practice. Endow our plain, common lives with the beauty and sanctity of unselfish service. Bless us with the consciousness that we have done that which is worthy and far beyond the thought of personal gain. Lead us on in a lofty faith and in deep desire to know and to do Thy will, and be with us until we reach the end of our days. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

TERMINATION OF LEASES FOR POST-OFFICE IMPROVEMENTS.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to strike from the calendar, No. 323, found on page 11 of the calendar, a bill that was enacted into law a year ago on an appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to strike from the calendar and lay on the table the bill of which the Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10244) repealing the law relating to the termination of leases for post-office premises.

Mr. GARNEZ. Mr. Speaker, what is the gentleman's request? The SPEAKER. To lay on the table a bill which has already been enacted into law on an appropriation bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CORRECTION OF A PAIR.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one minute in reference to a correction that should be made in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to address the House for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. This morning the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] called me over the telephone and asked me how he came to be paired against the resolution which was voted upon yesterday. I told him I had not looked over the pair list, and he asked me if I had not received his telegram, and I told him that I had not. After I came into the House just a moment ago the following telegram was handed me:

NEW YORK, January 23, 1923.

Representative W. R. GREEN,
Washington, D. C.:

Regret can not reach Washington in the evening. Please pair me for the resolution.

W. BOURKE COCKRAN.

I regret very much that I did not receive this telegram until to-day. I knew the gentleman from New York was in favor of the resolution. I had seen him a few days prior to the time it was taken up, and he told me he was in favor of it, and that he expected to be here and vote for it.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, entire Wall Street is in favor of it. [Laughter.]

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. No; the gentleman is mistaken. The Wall Street Journal has been opposing it all the time.

Mr. Speaker, I would ask, somewhat in the nature of a parliamentary inquiry, whether the pair list can be corrected now?

The SPEAKER. The Chair at first blush thinks the pair list is like the roll call in that respect.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, the pair list is a private matter. It is of no concern to the House of Representatives. If the gentleman from New York could find somebody to pair with him, somebody against the resolution, and wanted to ask unanimous consent that it be inserted in the RECORD, I can see no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. Of course that is true. The Chair thinks it is like correcting the RECORD; it can be done by unanimous consent. But of course this publicity practically accomplishes the same thing.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Of course I would have been pleased in any event to have attended to the matter of the gentleman from New York, but I would have been more than desirous under the circumstance, if I had gotten the telegram, to put the matter the way he wanted it. Naturally, as the author of the resolution, if the gentleman from New York was to be paired, I wanted him to be paired in favor of the resolution.

Mr. BLANTON. As it is now, he is paired against the resolution in the RECORD?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes; because I did not receive his telegram until to-day.

Mr. BLANTON. And, of course, two men will have to be selected to be paired against him in the new adjustment.

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Speaker, I regret I was not here to vote for the amendment. I wanted to be paired for the measure, and I so telegraphed to the gentleman from Iowa, and I think the RECORD ought to be made to conform with the disposition of the Member.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can ask unanimous consent that that pair be canceled.

Mr. COCKRAN. Yes; I will do that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the pair be canceled. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing an article by Mr. Garrett in the edition of January 13 of the Saturday Evening Post with reference to tax-exempt securities. It is an extremely well-written article, written in a popular manner. I think it would be of very great information to the public in regard to the action of the House yesterday.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes; it is a very well written, but it is a copyrighted article. I do not think a copyrighted article should be inserted in the RECORD, except with the consent of the publication. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

NO QUORUM—CALL OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa makes the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will bring in the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

There was no objection.

REQUEST TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. ROSENBLUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one minute and to revise and extend my remarks in 8-point type.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia asks unanimous consent to address the House for one minute and to revise and extend his remarks in 8-point type. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. What about?

Mr. ROSENBLUM. "The voice is Jacob's voice, but the hands are the hands of Esau."

Mr. MONDELL. I demand the regular order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BLANTON. The subject the gentleman announces is too general. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas objects.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman will tell us exactly what he is going to talk about—

Mr. ROSENBLUM. On the resolution that was adopted yesterday proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. BLANTON. I withdraw the objection.

Mr. MONDELL. I shall have to object to taking up time on that subject to-day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming objects.

Mr. ROSENBLUM. I have asked for only one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming objects. To-day is Calendar Wednesday. The Clerk will call the roll of the committees.

RADIO.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts (when the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries was called). Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 13773) to amend an act to regulate radio communication, approved August 13, 1912, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts calls up a bill, which will be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar, and the House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] will please take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. STAFFORD in the chair.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. ROSENBLUM. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of Congress entitled "An act to regulate radio communication," approved August 13, 1912, be amended by striking out sections 1, 2, and 3 thereof and by inserting in lieu thereof the sections 1, 2, and 3 following:

"SECTION 1. A. No person, company, or corporation within the jurisdiction of the United States shall use or operate any apparatus for radio communication as a means of intercourse among the several States or with foreign nations, or upon any vessel of the United States engaged in interstate or foreign commerce, or for the transmission of radiograms or signals the effects of which extend beyond the jurisdiction of the State, Territory, or the District of Columbia in which the same originate, or where interference would be caused thereby with the transmission or reception of messages or signals from beyond the jurisdiction of said State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, except under and in accordance with a license in that behalf granted by the Secretary of Commerce and except as hereinafter authorized.

"B. The Secretary of Commerce from time to time shall (a) classify licensed radio stations and the operators required therein; (b) prescribe the nature of the service to be rendered by each class of licensed station and assign bands of wave lengths thereto; (c) make, alter, and revoke regulations applicable to all licensed stations not inconsistent with this act or any other act of Congress or with the terms, binding on the United States, of any radio communication convention to which the United States is a party, concerning the service to be rendered by each class of stations so established; the location of any station; the wave lengths to be used by any station; the kind of instruments or apparatus in any station with respect to the external effect produced thereby; the power and the purity and sharpness of the waves of each station or the apparatus therein; the area to be served by any station and the times and methods of operating any station or the apparatus therein; (d) make such other regulations not inconsistent with law as he may deem necessary to prevent interference between all stations affected by this act. The Secretary shall have authority to exclude from the requirements of any regulations any radio station and the operators required therein, or to modify the same in his discretion, in any case in which he shall find that such action will facilitate commerce and will not be incompatible with the public interest.

"C. Every such license shall provide that the President of the United States, in time of war or public peril or disaster, may cause the closing of any station for radio communication and the removal therefrom of all radio apparatus, or may authorize the use or control of any such station or apparatus by any department of the Government, upon just compensation to the owners.

"D. Radio stations belonging to and operated by the United States shall not be subject to the provisions of paragraphs A and B of this section. All such Government stations shall use such wave lengths as shall be assigned to each by the President. All such stations, except stations on board naval and other Government vessels while at sea or beyond the limits of the continental United States, when transmitting any message other than a message relating to Government business, shall conform to such rules and regulations designed to prevent interference with other radio stations and the rights of others as the Secretary of Commerce may prescribe: Provided, That upon proclamation by the President that there exists war or a threat of war or a state of public peril or disaster or other emergency, the President may suspend or amend, for such time as he may see fit, the rules and regulations applicable to any or all stations within the jurisdiction of the United States. All stations owned and operated by the United States and all other stations on land and sea shall have special call letters designated by the Secretary of Commerce, and such stations and the designated call letters shall be included in the list of radio stations of the United States as published by the Department of Commerce. Radio stations on board vessels of the United States Shipping Board or the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation shall not be deemed to belong to or be operated by the United States or to be Government stations within the meaning and for the purposes of this act.

"Sec. 2. A. Paragraph A of section 1 of this act shall not apply to persons sending radio messages or signals on a foreign ship while the same is within the jurisdiction of the United States.

"B. The station license required hereby shall not be granted to, or after the granting thereof such license shall not in any manner, either voluntarily or involuntarily, be transferred to (a) any alien or the representative of any alien; (b) nor to any foreign government or the representative thereof; (c) nor to any company, corporation, or association organized under the laws of any foreign government; (d) nor to any company, corporation, or association of which any officer or director is an alien or of which more than one-fifth of the capital stock is owned, controlled, or voted by aliens or their representatives or by a foreign government or representative thereof, or by any company, corporation, or association organized under the laws of a foreign country.

"Such station license, the wave length or lengths authorized to be used by the licensee, and the rights therein granted shall not be transferred, assigned, or in any manner, either voluntarily or involuntarily, disposed of to any other person, company, or corporation without the consent in writing of the Secretary of Commerce.

"C. The Secretary of Commerce, subject to the limitations of this act, in his discretion, may grant to any applicant therefor a station license provided for in sections 1 and 2 hereof.

"No license granted by the Secretary shall be for a longer term than 10 years, and any license granted may be revoked as hereinafter provided. Upon the expiration of any license the Secretary, in his discretion, upon application thereof, may grant a renewal of such license for the same or for a lesser period of time.

"The Secretary of Commerce is hereby authorized to refuse a station license to any person, company, or corporation, or any subsidiary thereof, which, in the judgment of the Secretary, is monopolizing or seeking to monopolize radio communication, directly or indirectly, through the control of the manufacture or sale of radio apparatus or by any other means. The granting of a license shall not estop the United States from prosecuting such person, company, or corporation for a violation of the law against monopolies or restraint of trade.

"The Secretary of Commerce in granting any license for a commercial station intended or used for communication between the United States or any territory or possession, continental or insular, subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, the Canal Zone, or the Philippine Islands, and any foreign country, may impose any terms, conditions, or restrictions authorized to be imposed with respect to submarine cable licenses by section 2 of an act entitled 'An act relating to the landing and the operation of submarine cables in the United States,' approved May 27, 1921. Every license for such commercial station shall be approved by the President before the same shall be issued and become effective.

"D. The Secretary of Commerce may grant licenses only upon written application therefor addressed to him, which application shall set forth such facts as he by regulations may prescribe as to the citizenship, character, and financial, technical, and other ability of the applicant to operate the station; the ownership and location of the proposed station and of the stations with which it is proposed to communicate; the wave lengths and the power desired to be used; the hours of the day or other periods of time during which it is proposed to operate the station; the purposes for which the station is to be used; and such other information as he may require. Such application shall be signed by the applicant under oath or affirmation.

"E. Such station licenses as the Secretary of Commerce may grant shall be in such general form as he may prescribe, but each license shall contain, in addition to other provisions, a statement of the following conditions to which such license shall be subject: (a) The ownership or management of the station or apparatus therein shall not be transferred in violation of this act. There shall be no vested property right in the license issued for such station or in the bands of wave lengths authorized to be used therein, and neither the license nor any right granted thereunder shall be assigned or otherwise transferred in violation of this act; (b) such license shall contain such other conditions, not inconsistent with this act, as the Secretary of Commerce may prescribe.

"F. Any station license granted by the Secretary of Commerce shall be revocable by him for failure to operate service substantially as proposed in the application and as set forth in the license, for violation of or failure to observe any of the restrictions and conditions of this act, or of any regulation of the Secretary of Commerce authorized by this act, or by the provisions of any international radio convention ratified or adhered to by the United States or any regulations thereunder, or whenever any licensee who is a common carrier shall fail in the judgment of the Secretary of Commerce to provide reasonable facilities for the transmission of messages, or whenever the Interstate Commerce Commission in the exercise of the authority conferred upon it by law shall find that any licensee has made any unjust and unreasonable charge or has made or prescribed any unjust and unreasonable classification, regulation, or practice with respect to the transmission of messages or service, or whenever the Secretary of Commerce shall deem such revocation to be in the public interest: Provided, That no order of revocation shall take effect until 30 days' notice in writing thereof, stating the cause for the proposed revocation, to the parties known by the Secretary to be interested in such license. Any person in interest aggrieved by said order may make written application to the Secretary at any time within said 30 days for a hearing upon such order, and upon the filing of such written application said order of revocation shall stand suspended until the conclusion of the hearing herein directed. Notice in writing of said hearing shall be given by the Secretary to all the parties known to him to be interested in such license 20 days prior to the time of said hearing. Said hearing shall be conducted under such rules and in such manner as the Secretary may prescribe. Upon the conclusion thereof the Secretary may affirm, modify, or revoke said orders of revocation.

"Sec. 3. A. The actual operation of all transmitting apparatus in any radio station for which a station license is required by this act shall be carried on only by a person holding an operator's license issued hereunder. No person shall operate any such apparatus in such station except under and in accordance with an operator's license issued to him by the Secretary of Commerce.

"B. The Secretary of Commerce, in his discretion, may grant special temporary operators' licenses to operators of radio apparatus under such regulations in such form and under such conditions as he may prescribe, whenever an emergency arises requiring prompt employment of such an operator.

"C. An operator's license shall be issued by the Secretary of Commerce in response to a written application therefor, addressed to him, which shall set forth (a) the name, age, and address of the applicant; (b) the date and place of birth; (c) the country of which he is a citizen and, if a naturalized citizen of the United States, the date and place of naturalization; (d) the previous experience of the applicant in operating radio apparatus; and (e) such other facts or information as may be required by the Secretary of Commerce. Every application shall be signed by the applicant under oath or affirmation.

"D. An operator's license shall be issued only to a person who, in the judgment of the Secretary of Commerce, is proficient in the use and operation of radio apparatus and in the transmission and reception of radiograms by telegraphy and telephony. Except in an emergency found by the Secretary of Commerce to exist, an operator's license shall not be granted to any alien, nor shall a license be granted to a representative of a foreign government.

"E. An operator's license shall be in such form as the Secretary of Commerce shall prescribe and may be suspended by him for a period not exceeding two years upon proof sufficient to satisfy him that the licensee (a) has violated any provision of any act or treaty binding on the United States which the Secretary of Commerce is authorized by this act to administer, or of any regulation made by the Secretary under any such act or treaty; or (b) has failed to compel compliance therewith by any unlicensed person under his supervision; or (c) has failed to carry out the lawful orders of the master of the vessel on which he is employed; or (d) has willfully damaged or permitted apparatus to be damaged; or (e) has transmitted superfluous signals or signals containing profane or obscene words or language.

"F. A license may be revoked by the Secretary of Commerce upon proof sufficient to satisfy him that the licensee was at the date his license was granted to him, or is at the time of revocation, ineligible or unfit for a license.

"Sec. 4. A. After the approval of this act the construction of a station for which a license is required by this act shall not be begun, nor shall the construction of a station already begun be continued, until after a permit for its construction has been granted by the Secretary of Commerce upon written application therefor. This application shall set forth such facts as the Secretary of Commerce by regulation may prescribe as to the citizenship, character, and the financial, technical, and other ability of the applicant to construct and operate the station, the ownership and location of the proposed station and of the station or stations with which it is proposed to communicate, the wave length or wave lengths desired to be used, the hours of the day or other periods of time during which it is proposed to operate the station, the purpose for which the station is to be used, the type of transmitting apparatus to be used, the power to be used, the date upon which the station is expected to be completed and in operation, and such other information as the Secretary of Commerce may require. Such application shall be signed by the applicant under oath or affirmation.

"B. Such permit for construction shall show specifically the earliest and latest dates between which the actual operation of such station is expected to begin and shall provide that said permit will be automatically forfeited if the station is not ready for operation within the time specified, unless prevented by strikes, riots, acts of God, or other causes not under the control of the grantee. The rights granted under any such permit shall not be assigned or otherwise transferred to any person, persons, company, or corporation without the approval of the Secretary of Commerce: Provided, That a permit for construction shall not be required for Government stations or for private stations as provided for in section 4, fifteenth regulation, of the act of August 13, 1912. The granting of this permit to construct a station as herein required shall not of itself be construed to impose any duty or obligation upon the Secretary to issue a license for the operation of such station.

"Sec. 5. An advisory committee is hereby established to whom the Secretary of Commerce shall refer for examination and report such matters as he may deem proper relating to: (a) The administration or changes in the laws, regulations, and treaties of the United States relating to radio communication; (b) the study of the scientific problems involved in radio communication, with the view of furthering its development; (c) the scientific progress in radio communication and use of radio communication.

"The advisory committee shall consist of 15 members, of whom 1 shall be designated by the Secretary of State, 1 by the Secretary of the Treasury, 1 by the Secretary of War, 1 by the Secretary of the Navy, 1 by the Secretary of Agriculture, 1 by the Postmaster General, 1 by the Secretary of Commerce, and 1 by the chairman of the United States Shipping Board, to represent these departments, respectively, and 7 members of recognized attainment in radio communication not otherwise employed in the Government service, to be designated by the Secretary of Commerce.

"The necessary expenses of the members of the committee in going to, returning from, and while attending meetings of the committee, including clerical expenses and supplies, together with a per diem of $25 to each of the six members not otherwise employed in the Government service, for attendance at the meetings, shall be paid from the appropriation made to the Department of Commerce for this purpose.

"Sec. 6. Radio telephone stations, the signals of which can interfere with ship communication, are required to keep a licensed radio operator, of a class to be determined by the Secretary of Commerce, listening in on the wave length designated for distress signals during the entire period the transmitter of such station is in operation.

"Sec. 7. Regulation 1 of section 4 of said act of Congress approved August 13, 1912, is amended by striking out the words, 'this wave length shall not exceed 600 meters or it shall exceed 1,600 meters.'

"Regulation 2 of section 4 of said act of Congress approved August 13, 1912, as amended by striking out the words 'Provided, That they do not exceed 600 meters or that they do exceed 1,600 meters.'"

"Regulations 3 and 4 of section 4 of said act of Congress approved August 13, 1912, are hereby repealed."

"Regulations 15 and 16 of section 4 of said act of Congress approved August 13, 1912, are amended by striking out the words 'exceeding 200 meters' and substituting in lieu thereof the words 'of less than 150 meters nor more than 275 meters.'"

"SEC. 8. Any person, company, or corporation who shall erect, use, or operate any apparatus for radio communication in violation of this act, or knowingly aid or abet another person, company, or corporation in so doing, or knowingly make any false oath or affirmation for the purpose of securing a permit or a license, shall incur a penalty not to exceed $1,000, which may be mitigated or remitted by the Secretary of Commerce, and the permit or license of any person, company, or corporation who shall violate any of the provisions of this act, or of any of the regulations of the Secretary of Commerce issued hereunder, or knowingly make any false oath or affirmation for the purpose of securing a permit or license, may be suspended or revoked by the Secretary of Commerce."

"SEC. 9. That the Secretary of Commerce is hereby authorized and directed to charge, and through the imposition of stamp taxes on applications, licenses, or other documents, or in other appropriate manner, to collect the fees specified in the schedule following. The Secretary shall collect said fees through the collectors of customs or other officers designated by him, and he may make such regulations as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this section."

"SCHEDULE OF FEES TO BE COLLECTED FOR TRANSMITTING STATIONS AND OPERATORS' LICENSES."

"For transoceanic radio station license, $300 per annum; for commercial land station license, other than transoceanic, 1 kilowatt transmitter input or less, $50 per annum, and for each additional kilowatt or fraction thereof, $5 per annum; for ship station license, $25 per annum; for experiment station license, $25 per annum; for technical and training school station license, $15 per annum; for special amateur station license, $10 per annum; for general and restricted amateur station license, $2.50 per annum; for commercial extra first-class operator's license, $2.50 per annum; for commercial first-class operator's license, $1.50 per annum; for commercial second-class operator's license, $1 per annum; for commercial cargo grade operator's license, 50 cents per annum; for experiment and instruction grade operator's license, $1 per annum; for amateur first-grade operator's license, 50 cents per annum; for amateur second-grade operator's license, 50 cents per annum; for commercial extra first-class radio operator's examination for license, $2.50 for each examination; for commercial first-class radio operator's examination for license, $2 for each examination; for commercial second-class radio operator's examination for license, $1.50 for each examination; for commercial cargo grade radio operator's examination for license, $1 for each examination; for experiment and instruction grade radio operator's examination for license, $1 for each examination; for amateur first-grade radio operator's examination for license, $1 for each examination; for amateur second-grade radio operator's examination for license, 50 cents for each examination."

"In the event that other classes of station and operators' licenses or other examinations shall hereafter be prescribed in any lawful manner, the Secretary of Commerce is hereby authorized and directed to charge and collect in the same manner as herein provided fees for such new classes of licenses and of examinations, which fees shall be substantially of the amount herein specified for the license and examination nearest in character and purpose to the new license or examination so prescribed."

"For failure to pay at the time and in the manner specified by the Secretary of Commerce any of the above fees the Secretary of Commerce is authorized to refuse to issue such licenses, or, if issued, to suspend or revoke the same, as he may deem proper."

"SEC. 10. Wherever the words 'naval and military stations' appear in the act to regulate radio communication approved August 13, 1912, said words 'naval and military' shall be stricken out and the word 'Government' substituted in place thereof."

"SEC. 11. All acts or parts of acts in conflict with this act are hereby repealed."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] is recognized for one hour.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, would the gentleman from Massachusetts like to agree on a limit of time for debate?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Under the rule we have an hour on a side. If there is no call for debate on the bill, we can close the debate at any time.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. The gentleman is correct about that. I was going to suggest that we take only half an hour on a side.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. There is no objection to that, so far as I know. There is no objection to the bill on either side of the House. We have a unanimous report on the bill. We want to expedite business to-day if possible, as I have four bills to present.

Mr. BLANTON. There is just one paragraph that I think needs discussion. There ought to be some little time for discussion on just one paragraph.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I am willing to allow discussion if the gentleman can get time from his side.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. If there is no limitation agreed on, there is an hour on a side.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, this bill has been fully considered by the committee and in special hearings that were held at the Department of Commerce. It has had the widest consideration, both by your committee and by the Department of Commerce.

Of course, the question of radio is one of the most absorbing questions now before the country. The first law was passed in 1912, and it has served a very good purpose. It covers all the expanse above us and all around us all over the world. It is wonderful to note the advancement that has been made in the use of radio and the number of demands that have been made for it. I do not think anybody could imagine the amount of material that has been brought to our attention in the preparation and consideration of this bill. On account of its importance, and because of the general belief of the membership of the committee that the bill is a very essential one, it comes to you with a unanimous report, and if you will give it attention I think we shall be able to close the debate and come to a vote thereon at an early hour.

I yield such time to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. WHITE], chairman of the radio subcommittee, as he may desire to use in presenting this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine is recognized. [Applause.]

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I have been so much occupied the last three or four days in persuading myself that I did not have the grippe, and that I was growing better and better each day, that I have had no time and no disposition to prepare a statement on the bill. What I say, therefore, will be based on the general information I have and on some notes hurriedly placed on paper within the last hour. I do wish to make a very brief general statement, and then, if it please the members of the committee, I will go through the bill section by section, stating the purpose of and the reasons which prompted the committee to frame the particular provisions.

The bill amends and enlarges the radio act of 1912 which has been and is now the basic law on the subject. At that time radio was in its infancy. For a year after the approval of that act, or as of June 30, 1913, there was not a single broadcasting station in the United States. There was at that time only one transoceanic station communicating with Germany, and that in a purely experimental stage of development. Outside of ship stations communicating between ship and ship and between ship and shore, and outside of amateurs, who at that time transmitted on a short wave length and with a low power, and who interfered very little with others, there were less than 100 transmitting stations in the United States. Radio was used practically wholly for communication at sea. Since that date there has come a most amazing development. As of January 1, 1923, there were something like 21,000 transmitting stations in the United States. Something like 2,762 of those stations were on board ship. There were about 570 broadcasting stations scattered throughout the United States, one or more in every State of the Union except the State of Mississippi. There were 12 transoceanic stations communicating with Great Britain, France, Germany, Poland, Holland, Italy, Hawaii, Japan, and there were other stations in contemplation of erection.

As the number of stations has multiplied so have the uses of radio multiplied. To-day we find this instrumentality used not alone for communication between ship and ship and ship and shore, but we find it utilized in our Coast Guard Service. We find it being availed of for the transmission of weather and crop reports, for time signals, for music, for sermons, and an infinite variety of matter of educational, entertainment, and religious value.

It has become well recognized now that there are physical limitations to the use of the air. Going back to last July, 1922, there were available for use in this country only about 191 different wave lengths. Of these 191 wave lengths 122 were utilized by something like 279 Government stations. That left available for over 17,000 private stations only 69 available wave lengths. From these physical limitations and this vast increase in use and users have come conditions which demand a more systematic ordering of the paths of the air and of those who use these paths. It is as essential that there shall be a law and regulation governing the use of these air paths and that traffic policemen enforce these laws and these rules and regulations as that there should be similar provisions and similar control of the movements of traffic in the streets of the cities of the Nation.

I think the users of radio recognize the situation that has come, recognize how the different users are crowding and jostling and interfering with each other in the air.

I think the first public expression of this recognition came from a radio conference called by Secretary Hoover, with the approval of the President, and held in this city in the early part of last summer or in the late spring. That conference was held at the Department of Commerce. The members of the conference, with one or two exceptions, were men familiar with the general subject, familiar with the commercial use of radio, and equally familiar with the technical and scientific aspects of the art. That conference held hearings for several days, at which all persons interested appeared and made specific recommendations as to needed legislation and also made specific recommendations as to technical details. After hearing these many witnesses the conference resolved itself into two committees, one a technical committee, one a legal committee, and the particular province of the legal committee was to frame a proposed bill which would make possible and make effective the recommendations of the technical committee and of the full conference.

The genesis of this bill now before you was in the recommendations of that conference. Your Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries has conducted hearings. Hearings were held a short while ago, and from time to time during the last two or three Congresses other committees of the Congress, both of the House and the Senate, have considered various phases of this subject.

I want to repeat what has been said by the chairman, that the bill comes before the House with the unanimous recommendation of the committee, and, like all legislation, is a composite of the views of the individual members of the committee.

I think all who use the radio, all who utilize it for the transmission of intelligence, or who listen in for communications by this means, and the general public are vitally interested that the legislation should be passed. It is not a comprehensive radio law. It leaves the 1912 act practically intact.

It does seek—and this is the prime purpose of the legislation—it does seek to confer on the regulatory body, the Secretary of Commerce, powers of regulation commensurate with the difficulties of the situation and adequate to clear these paths, these lines of communication in the air, so that they may be used with the utmost efficiency. That is all I care to say as a general statement. I shall be glad to go through the bill if members of the committee are interested, in detail, and as I go along over the particular paragraphs of the bill I will answer as far as I can any questions that may be asked with respect to them.

Mr. MACGREGOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Yes.

Mr. MACGREGOR. I do not know anything about radio, but I assume that the purpose of the bill is to prevent conflict between wave lengths.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. That is one of the primary purposes.

Mr. MACGREGOR. What is the object of making all these details in reference to procuring licenses and affixing stamps, creating a new bureau for the examination of operators, if the only purpose is to fix the wave lengths?

Mr. WHITE. It does not create anything new. That is already done by the Bureau of Navigation in the Department of Commerce. What we have sought to do is to make certain and to make sure some of the doubtful powers of the Department of Commerce, the powers which in many cases they are now unable to enforce because of defects in the existing law. All of this is done under existing law—all the licensing of operators is done under existing law. We have only dealt with the subject with more particularity than does existing law.

Now, I will call attention to some of the changes in existing law. Section 1 (a) of the bill is in almost identical language with section 1 of the act of 1912. It might be called the basis of the entire legislation. It is the assertion of jurisdiction by Congress over this kind of communication between States and between States and foreign nations. There is no change in substance in section 1 (a) from existing law.

Section 1 (b) has in it nothing radically different from existing law. I think I may state it is this way—that there is existing law for substantially every provision contained in section 1 (b). We have, however, in section 1 (b) stated the powers directly and affirmatively. We have not left them to inference, as they are left in some cases under existing law.

Mr. KNUTSON. The gentleman is now referring to section 1 (b).

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Could the gentleman explain in a short way who has to have license under this bill; what class of people?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. This bill does not touch the receiver at all. There are in the United States, as I said, something like 21,000 transmitting stations. No one can tell how many receiving stations there are, but the estimates run all the way from a million and a half to two and a half million receiving sets. This legislation does not touch the operator or the receiving set at all, but it does require, as does existing law, a license for every transmitting set, except the Government sets. No license is required for stations owned and operated by the Government.

Mr. SNELL. But at the present time everyone who transmits anything through the air has to get out a personal license?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. He requires a license under existing law, and this does not change that at all.

Mr. SNELL. Is there any restriction upon how many licenses are to be permitted or can anyone get a license who applies for it?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. One of the defects of the existing law is that no one knows whether the issuance of a license is mandatory upon the Secretary of Commerce, or whether it rests in his discretion. By this legislation we have sought to make it certain that the issuance of licenses is in the discretion of the Secretary; that he is to be guided by what is in the public interest, and he is not required to issue the license when the granting of it would be prejudicial to public interests.

Mr. SNELL. How is he to decide that, if a large number apply for license in one part of the country and a few in another?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Let me get on with my explanation of section 1 (b).

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Yes.

Mr. BARBOUR. I would like to ask the gentleman a question about the subject of licenses. If the gentleman wants to wait until he reaches that, very well.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I will ask the gentleman to ask his question now.

Mr. BARBOUR. I notice the requirement in section b on page 10—

Mr. WHITE of Maine. That is as to operators' licenses?

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I will ask the gentleman to wait until I come to that.

Mr. BARBOUR. Other questions were brought up in respect to the matter of licenses, and that is what prompted me now.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. There are two classes of licenses provided. There is the station license and then there is the operator's license, and that same distinction exists in the present law.

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Yes.

Mr. HOCH. Does the committee consider that the jurisdiction of the Federal Government in this field rests entirely upon the commerce clause of the Constitution, or does it consider that the Federal Government has some primary or inherent jurisdiction over the air in the matter of the transmission of these messages?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I can not answer for the committee upon that point. I think we started out with the proposition that Congress had legislated in substantially this manner some ten years ago; that the right of Congress to exercise this jurisdiction has never been questioned; and we base this legislation upon that original proposition and upon the acquiescence of the people in that exercise of jurisdiction of these 10 years.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Yes.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Many people have in their homes receiving stations. They get musical entertainments in my home city from Chicago and St. Louis. They are seriously interfered with by irresponsible boys who have built stations. Does this bill seek to do away with that kind of a nuisance?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. This bill gives to the Secretary of Commerce power to put into force rules and regulations which we hope will do much to obviate that difficulty.

Mr. LONDON. Is the discretion of the Secretary of Commerce reviewable by a court, or is his discretion absolute?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. We have left it in the absolute discretion of the Secretary.

Mr. LONDON. Does the gentleman believe that to be a safe way to do?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. At the present time, yes. I think we have a condition now where there must be drastic action taken, action taken quickly, or the value of this means of communication is lost to the people of the country.

Mr. LONDON. Why should not an aggrieved party be in a position to apply to the court for relief?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Because it means interminable delay and it probably means—and I say this with great respect to the courts—a less intelligent action than we will get through the Secretary of Commerce.

Mr. MACGREGOR. Do I understand that the gentleman believes in creating a czarlike bureau down here in the Department of Commerce? Is that the proposition?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I would say generally that I think I am as much out of harmony with the tendency to centralize here in Washington as anyone can be, but I think of all the activities of the Nation to-day, this is the one in which all persons interested, whether as transmitters or receivers, are beseeching the Government to exercise a larger degree of control than it ever has heretofore.

Mr. MCKENZIE. The question asked by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] is a very pertinent question, but in this bill you have provided that the Secretary of Commerce shall guard against the building up of a monopoly.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Yes.

Mr. MCKENZIE. Which is perfectly proper, but in all justice to the public, the discretion should be lodged somewhere to prevent everyone exercising the right to send out messages.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I do not want to take any more time than is necessary. Section 1 (b) of the bill restates the powers which it is claimed the Secretary of Commerce now has under existing law but which in some instances have been denied by users of radio. It gives him general power to classify radio stations and assign bands of wave lengths to different classes of stations and to the particular stations. It gives him power to make general rules or regulations aimed to prevent interference between the different users of the ether. It gives him power to control the kinds of instruments to be installed in stations with reference to the external effects of those instruments.

And I may say generally this is the clause which gives power to the Secretary to do the essential things which the committee feels will bring a semblance of order out of chaos as it now exists. Now, subsection (c) is a restatement of what is already in existing law. It gives to the President of the United States in time of war or peril or public disaster power to cause the closing of any radio station in the United States, and to take over the apparatus and the station for the purpose of government during such emergency. Subsection (d) is an important paragraph in the bill. I suppose there has been more controversy over this particular section than over any other. I have stated already that 279 Government stations were utilizing about 122 out of 191 of the available wave lengths as of the 1st of July. It has been a great problem, a troublesome problem, to know how to bring the different departments of the Government using radio into a harmonious relationship with each other and how to fit them into the general scheme of communication.

Some of the Government departments wish to be a law unto themselves, to recognize no other authority than their own desires and their own judgment as to their needs and importance. Then we found a great body of private users of radio who thought the Government was encroaching altogether too far and too much into this field to the exclusion of legitimate and desirable uses by private agencies. We finally worked out this compromise. This paragraph removes Government stations from the general authority of the Secretary of Commerce. It provides in terms and in effect that no license is required of a Government station. Under the law heretofore and under the practice Government stations have been helping themselves, without regard to any other interest, to whatever wave lengths they saw fit and have been using them when and as they saw fit. This section now provides that the President shall allocate to the various Government departments the wave lengths which each shall have the right to use. If this is enacted into law we do not leave it to the War Department, we do not leave it to the Navy Department, or to the Agricultural Department, or any other particular agency of the Government to take what it can, disregarding the rights and interests of others, but we have placed upon the President, believing he will be a fair arbiter between the conflicting interests, the duty of allocating wave lengths to the different agencies of the Government.

Mr. EDMONDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I do.

Mr. EDMONDS. I desire to ask this question: Wave lengths only apply to the sending of radio messages. It has nothing to do with the receiving of messages?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I think I have already stated this bill applies only to the transmitting stations, and it does not affect directly receiving stations at all.

Mr. EDMONDS. I wanted the House to understand distinctly that it had nothing to do with the receiving end of the line, but only with the sending end of the line.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman state for the benefit of the House what various departments of the Government now operate independent radio systems?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Well, the Department of Commerce maintains stations; the Navy Department, the War Department, the Interior Department, the Post Office Department, the Treasury Department, the Coast Guard Service, the Lighthouse Service, the Agricultural Department, and practically every department of the Government is making some use of radio. Now, I have said this section places the burden, and it is a "burden," on the President to allocate wave lengths for the different members of his family.

The Secretary of Commerce has no control over Government stations being utilized for governmental purposes. We have here added a provision that except on vessels while at sea or beyond the limits of continental United States Government stations, in transmitting any other matter than governmental matter, must bring themselves within the ordered system, and must observe such rules and regulations as the Secretary of Commerce may prescribe designed to prevent interference. Now, I may say after many conferences that proposition was agreed to by the Navy Department, and it is accepted by the various members of the committee which had jurisdiction, and it has been accepted as a compromise measure, as the best thing that can be worked out at this time. And that is the purport and effect of this subsection D.

Mr. EVANS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I do.

Mr. EVANS. I notice in the gentleman's statement just made he said the Government stations transmitting Government business. I notice in the bill it uses the term "Government stations or stations belonging to the Government and operated by it." Is not there a distinction; and if not, how does the gentleman explain his statement with the language of the bill?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Well, I do not know that I quite understand the gentleman's question. As a matter of fact, I think all Government stations, all stations owned by the Government, are operated by the Government. It might have been an unnecessary repetition of language there, but I think all stations owned by the Government are operated by the Government except possibly the stations on board vessels owned by the United States Shipping Board or by the United States Emergency Fleet Corporation.

Mr. HUSTED. Am I correct in assuming that this bill proposes to confer no authority whatever upon the Government to regulate the receiving stations?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. That is true. Of course, I may say, enlarging upon my answer, that it is a very serious question, one that we must ultimately meet, as to whether the Government ought not to exercise some degree of jurisdiction and some degree of control over these receiving stations.

Theoretically these stations, these instruments, take messages only, but, as a matter of fact, through lack of skill in operation or because the instruments are inefficient or out of date quite a number of these receiving sets do radiate energy into the air, which interferes with transmitting stations. Now, how far that goes I can not say. There is some disagreement about it. They radiate unintelligible energy, but it is energy which can in some instances and does in some instances interfere with transmission, and that raises the question of whether sooner or later we shall not have to assume jurisdiction over these receiving stations. There is a very practical reason, however, for not doing it at this time. It would mean a tremendous enlargement of the personnel in the Department of Commerce if we undertook to license some two and one-half million receiving stations and undertook to exercise any sort of governmental supervision over them, and, accordingly, we have gone around that question at this time.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The gentleman, of course, will remember that the hearings disclosed that the manufacturers believe that they are making progress in preventing interference by receiving sets, and it is hoped that the time will come when it will be entirely unnecessary for anybody to interfere by the use of a receiving set, and when the instruments shall have been perfected it may be possible to bring in some legislation which will only apply to those having receiving sets which actually interfere.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I am glad to have the gentleman make the statement. The gentleman is accurate in his statement. I repeat that the development of the art will either have to cure this thing or else legislation must ultimately be undertaken to solve it.

Now, going on, I will say nothing about section 2 (a) unless somebody desires to ask a question. Section 2 (b) is really new, but the germ of the section is found in the 1912 law. The 1912 law provides that a license for a station shall only be granted to a citizen of the United States. That is provided in the 1912 law. We have changed that somewhat, and have undertaken to define in some detail who an alien is to whom a license may not be granted, and that section has been drawn with some care, and we hope it will cover the situation.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Yes.

Mr. BARBOUR. Have you placed any provision in the bill that will prevent a station from breaking into another station in the same State?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. The basis of the jurisdiction is the transmission beyond the limits of a single State or the interference with transmission from beyond the limits of a single State. If you went down to the great State of Texas, for example, I can imagine they might put up a station operated with a short wave length that might not interfere with the messages on the border of the State, or with messages going to and from across the State. But if it did transmit its energy beyond the confines of the State or did interfere with any other station doing that thing, this bill would reach that situation.

Mr. BARBOUR. And the fact is that this bill requires a license in every case on account of the possibility of interference with other stations?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I think it forbids the operation of a station which does this thing. It may be a practical question some time as to whether a station is transmitting beyond the limits of the State or is interfering.

Mr. BARBOUR. Who would decide that? The Secretary of Commerce?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I presume so, in the first instance.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Yes.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. As to those who have stations now, would they have any previous right to hold these licenses?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. The bill does not void or revoke existing licenses.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. They will all be continued, will they?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I might as well discuss that problem here. Under existing law a license is required, but there is nothing in the law which limits or fixes the term of the license. Under the existing law the Secretary of Commerce, as I view it, might grant to you or to a corporation or to any plant an exclusive license to operate on a particular wave length for a hundred years of time, and there is nothing in the existing law which prevents him from doing that thing. As a matter of practice, under existing law, the licenses are granted for a year's time only, so that at the expiration of the current year of a license, I assume, if this bill becomes a law, every man must renew his application and must bring himself within the terms of the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I was wondering what the situation would be in a case where, say like that of last Sunday, they took this sending station over to the First Congregational Church and used it for the purpose of broadcasting a certain concert. Would this bill prevent the loaning of a station to somebody else for sending out messages on a particular occasion? They have to get a distinct and separate license, of course, for sending out a concert.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. The framers of the bill believe this language which follows to be of vital consequence. It is absolutely essential, if the regulation is to be effective, that the regulatory body may know who is utilizing and operating a station, and the language which follows in the bill provides that such station license and the wave length authorized to be used by the licensee and the rights therein granted shall not be transferred or assigned or in any manner voluntarily or involuntarily disposed of without the consent in writing of the Secretary, and I believe it is eminently proper that if a license is granted to me to transmit I shall not turn it over to the gentleman from New York or any other gentleman to transmit.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. In that connection, I understand the law would prohibit anybody else from using a sending station who did not have a license, and would prohibit the sending station being transferred to anybody else, unless the person who held the license would send his agent over with the instrument for taking care of the case.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I never considered that question in detail, but I would say generally that under the language in the bill the power given to the Secretary is such that he could prohibit that sort of thing.

The bill, in what I will call its granting clause, gives authority to the Secretary to make regulations concerning the area to be served by any particular station. That is important, because if you get an unlimited number of stations into a narrow area you are going to have a congestion that all the other rules and regulations which may be devised will not cure. I think it is vital that if a license is granted the Secretary shall have power to specify where that station shall operate.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Does not section (b), on page 2, directly give him that authority?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I think so.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Does existing law prohibit the giving of license to aliens?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Existing law says a license shall be granted only to a citizen of the United States or to a corporation organized under the law of any State. That may be an alien corporation.

Mr. RAMSEYER. What is the fundamental reason for prohibiting an alien who is properly in this country and doing business here, and living here under the laws of the United States, from having a license? Even the son of an alien who is also an alien could not have an amateur transmitting set.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I will answer that in two ways. In the first instance that is existing law as we understand it, and we have undertaken to avoid changing the existing law as far as possible.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Is it because we are suspicious of aliens?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. As a matter of fact, there is another reason for it. I doubt if you can go into any foreign country as an alien to that country and obtain a license there.

Mr. RAMSEYER. That leads me to another question. Has the gentleman looked up the question whether this is in violation of any treaty stipulation as to the rights of the nationals of other countries in this country and the reciprocal rights of our nationals in another country?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. That question was not gone into in the committee, but I have had occasion to look at it somewhat. I do not think it is entirely free from doubt, but that has been the law for 10 years, and so far as I know, no one has ever seen fit to question the law or the right.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I am not questioning it.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. No one has ever suggested that it is violative of any treaty. I think it is only what we are doing, as a matter of fact, with respect to other matters. Our navigation laws exclude aliens from certain privileges that are reserved for Americans, and we are doing here only what we have done in other fields of activity.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. We exclude aliens from being officers on American ships.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Yes.

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HUSTED. If I understood the gentleman correctly he stated that this bill proposes to vest in the Secretary of Commerce an absolute discretion to regulate this whole matter, a discretion which is not reviewable by the courts. Is that correct?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I think that is correct.

Mr. HUSTED. I assume that the right to transmit these messages is a substantial right?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. A good many people have thought so who have discovered afterwards that it was not. But I will answer the gentleman; yes.

Mr. HUSTED. It would be assumed to be?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I think so.

Mr. HUSTED. Well, I do not suppose the Secretary of Commerce would discriminate, but assuming that he should promulgate some unreasonable rules and regulations or discriminate in the matter of issuing licenses, does the gentleman think the courts should be denied the right to review his action, or that the jurisdiction of the courts could be divested by any action that he might take?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. If the courts can not be ousted, no harm has been done. As a matter of fact, I think everybody who is interested, manufacturers of radio instruments, transmitters by radio, and listeners in on radio much prefer to have this absolute power vested in the Secretary than to have it relegated to the courts.

I have been taking more time than I ought too—

Mr. KNUTSON. I think the gentleman ought to be permitted to go through the bill. He has talked 40 minutes and has not come to the second section.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I intended to take only about 10 minutes.

Mr. ARENTZ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I will yield to the gentleman from Nevada and then I want to discuss other sections of the bill.

Mr. ARENTZ. Will this bill, if it is passed, supersede the Army regulations in the Panama Canal Zone or in Panama City?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I assume the gentleman refers to the Government station at Panama?

Mr. ARENTZ. Yes.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. The President is given power to give to that station whatever wave length he sees fit.

Mr. ARENTZ. Then a broadcasting station could not be set up in any club in Panama or any place where there is music and entertainment, and broadcast the same over the Canal Zone and the Canal Zone amateurs listen in?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Oh, yes.

Mr. ARENTZ. That can not be done now under regulations promulgated by the Governor of the Canal Zone?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I will not undertake to answer that question in detail. So far as this particular bill goes, I will say that the Secretary could grant a license to a broadcasting station here.

I have taken altogether too much time. I am only going to refer now to one or two particular sections of the bill. There has been much fear—and there has been some basis for it—that certain interests were undertaking to create a monopoly with respect to radio instruments and with respect to radio transmission.

Mr. EDMONDS. In answer to the gentleman from Nevada, I should like to say that the Panama Canal Zone is not covered by the present act, and therefore is not covered by this bill. It is subject to regulations prescribed by the authorities on the Zone.

Mr. ARENTZ. Then it means that it is entirely within the province of the military officials and the Governor of the Canal Zone to prohibit what is a common practice among high-school students in this country and among men and women who know something about radio.

Mr. EDMONDS. That is a military zone and should be kept under the military authorities properly.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I have said that there has been much fear expressed that there were interests undertaking to acquire a monopoly not only of radio instruments but of radio transmission. If this were not a short session of Congress, which is coming to an end within a few weeks, I think your committee would have been anxious to have recommended some detailed legislation dealing with that subject. We all agreed that at this time to go into a comprehensive field of that nature would defeat what we believed to be the absolutely essential provisions of the bill. So we have postponed that subject to a later time. We have written into the bill two or three provisions which, we think, will do much to exert a restraining influence over whoever might seek to acquire monopolistic rights. We have written in the bill a specific provision that the Secretary may refuse a license to any group of persons whom he believes are seeking to monopolize radio, either through control of patents or instruments or by other means. We have written into the bill that in the granting of licenses for commercial stations intended to transmit oceanic communication the Secretary of Commerce may write into the license such restrictions, conditions, or terms as may be imposed with respect to licenses under the cable landing license bill.

There is a further provision that any license with respect to these stations must be approved by the President. We have put in also other provisions which at this time I will not undertake to deal with. We are firm in our belief that the legislation is imperatively needed, and while it is not the last word on the subject it will do much for this art. [Applause.]

Mr. BARBOUR. If the gentleman will yield, it is just as I feared, the gentleman has not got to that part of the bill where I wanted to interrogate him.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I feel like apologizing to the members of the committee for taking as much time as I have.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I will say that so far as other members of the subcommittee are concerned, unless there is some objection I am perfectly willing that the gentleman from Maine shall continue.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I want to hear the gentleman from Illinois, because he has been a student of the bill and is as familiar as anybody in the House on the subject.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The gentleman on the other side will have an hour, and they may be desirous of asking the gentleman some questions.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, if I understand it rightly, I would like to know, as long as no arrangement was made about the time, if any Member is recognized he will be entitled to an hour.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BURNETT). No; there is an hour on each side.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maine?

There was no objection.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I will ask if it is not the fact that in the consideration of business on Calendar Wednesday there are only two hours for general debate, one hour on each side; that is, one hour for those in favor of the legislation and one hour for those opposed?

The CHAIRMAN. That is correct.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I claim recognition in opposition to the bill if no one on the committee is opposed to it.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I am not opposed to the bill, but I thought as the ranking member of the minority of the committee I would have a right to an hour's time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is a member of the committee but not opposed to the bill. Is there a member of the committee that is opposed to the bill?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I am not a member of the committee, but I am opposed to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the statement of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] that he is opposed to the bill and no member of the committee being opposed to the bill, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] is entitled to recognition.

Mr. KNUTSON. Can not the gentleman from Texas claim the hour and then yield the hour to his colleague [Mr. HARDY]?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I am willing to yield a part of the time, but I want to yield such time as those in opposition may claim.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I suggest that the gentleman from Texas take such time as he deems proper and then yield the balance.

The CHAIRMAN. Inasmuch as no member of the committee is opposed to the bill, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] for one hour.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I dislike to take a position contrary to that of the members of the committee who have had the privilege of studying the measure more thoroughly than I have had, especially such faithful and efficient members as constitute this committee. But it seems to me that the disposition to rush into the hands of the Federal authorities for regulation is getting too great in this House, and I take my position by virtue of the recommendation made in the committee's own report. I believe that if the Members of the House will read the report carefully they will reach the conclusion that we ought not to pass a measure of this kind at this time. The time may come in the development of this art when it may be important to pass legislation, but I do not believe this measure should pass, at least not at the present time. This is an important question and I am in favor of any necessary legislation, but it should be necessary and should be presented later when a more thorough consideration is possible.

I want to call the attention of the committee to some of the provisions in the bill and to some of the statements that are made in the report on the bill. I do not know—this is a new proposition, but I am very much interested in it and so are many people throughout the country. I do not believe simply because here is a great project that is rapidly developing, which has made tremendous strides under the law as it exists to-day, that we should rush into the hands of a single Federal official with absolute control of the situation, and create a Federal bureau which this new bill does create; go to a great deal more expense necessarily, at this stage when the art is developing rapidly and when, according to the committee's own report, they have not been able to present a comprehensive bill. They have not investigated it sufficiently to offer a comprehensive bill. On this bill the committee makes a report in which it says:

The radio art changes overnight. It is neither standardized nor stabilized. There is to-day no like activity attracting the attention of so many technical and scientific men as this. The research departments of the Government and of the greatest technical companies of the country and thousands of amateurs are engrossed in its study.

While that condition exists, a committee rushes into the House with a bill of 18 pages, undertaking to license every station that sends messages and every operator who sends messages, when the business is changing overnight, when it is rapidly developing under the present law. They want to put into the hands of one man the power to absolutely control the situation. They are putting into the hands of the Secretary of Commerce, who is already a busy man, under the terms of this bill a power that should not be granted to any man, at least until it shall have proved absolutely necessary after the most thorough and exhaustive study. Of course the Secretary of Commerce is going to get much of his information from the big companies, necessarily. He will have to get it from some one, and he will get it from the experts of the big companies. Here is something more that this report says:

The bill before you is not a comprehensive radio law, but is limited in its scope. There are many phases of the subject which invite study and in which in the not distant future may call for legislative action.

The point that I am making is not that additional legislation may not be found necessary. On the contrary, in the growth and development it may be found very necessary, but why rush in here when the business is growing by leaps and bounds and change a law under which it is growing and developing, when the committee have not had the proper time to consider the matter, when the business has not yet reached a state when they can offer a comprehensive law about it? There is a tendency on the part of Congress and upon the part of Members of Congress to talk about Federal licensing and Federal regulation and then decry it, but when the occasion arises they will say it is just this one step more, and gradually the Federal Government is taking charge of a great many of the activities of the country. I am not in favor of granting these broadening powers to these people without thorough study and the necessity for it being shown.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. HUSTED. I am interested in what the gentleman has said. He said the Secretary of Commerce would get some information from the experts of the great companies.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. HUSTED. What possible harm could there be if he did?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I did not mention that in criticism, but simply in connection with the statement that I believe the bill as drawn would not prevent the growth of monopolies in connection with the business; and, on the other hand, its result might be to encourage them. The Secretary of Commerce is a busy man. He would necessarily have to depend for his information upon these experts. It is just as natural for a man to look after his own interests, and for a corporation to look after its own interests, as it is for sparks to fly upward; and if companies want to create a monopoly, they will work to that end.

Mr. ROACH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. ROACH. Is it not fairer to assume that the Secretary of Commerce will rely for his information upon the advisory committee of 15 which this bill provides for in section 5?

Mr. JONES of Texas. That is another one of the things that I object to—an advisory committee of 15 members. That creates a new bureau, a new Federal regulatory board, and this advisory committee would simply after all be an advisory committee. It is to be appointed by certain members of the different departments of the Government, and if you should undertake to establish fully the activities of the advisory committee, you might ultimately have a great many more Federal employees, when we already have too many of them at the present time. If he undertook to fully carry out that provision, it would be tremendously expensive, and if he did not, he would necessarily have to rely upon the information that he could obtain from different corporations.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman point out any provision in the bill which warrants the statement he made about creating a large force of employees?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I was just calling attention to the section which was just called to my attention, section 5 on page 13, which provides for an advisory committee, to be established by the Secretary of Commerce, to consist of 15 members.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Is that a thousand employees?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I did not say anything about its being a thousand employees; and if the gentleman had listened to what I said, he would not make that statement. I said if they carried out the activities of those 15 men and they went into it thoroughly, they would have many employees before they got through with a lot of these investigations; and that is absolutely true, as is shown by our experience in various departments.

Mr. ROACH. Several of these members who are to constitute the advisory board, appointed by the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, and other members of the Cabinet, are now operating great radio systems, are they not?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I do not know whether they are or not. Of course they are using it extensively, I assume.

Mr. ROACH. And they are peculiarly in a position to know the facts?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I do not know that there is any idea of appointing on this committee men who were already operating such stations.

Mr. ROACH. The bill provides for the appointment of these men.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I know it does.

Mr. ROACH. They are now operating large radio stations.

Mr. JONES of Texas. That further bears out the argument that I make about the result that would be obtained.

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. LAZARO. The gentleman said that radio was increasing by leaps and bounds.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. LAZARO. If we regulated it in its infancy, as we did in the law of 1913, then according to the gentleman's statement is it not reasonable to now extend those regulations in 1923?

Mr. JONES of Texas. That may be, but I say the situation depicted by the committee in its report and their statement shows that the bill is not comprehensive; that it can not be at this time, and that argues absolutely against our going into a situation of this kind near the close of the session, extending Federal regulations in a very extensive way. The confusion that has arisen has been due more to the sudden and tremendous growth of the business than to any lack of regulatory powers. The existing law goes very far in authorizing regulation.

Mr. LAZARO. The gentleman will admit that if the people are to get the benefit of this growing thing there ought to be more regulation than in 1913.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I do not subscribe to the doctrine that in order for people to get the benefit of an institution there must be more and more Federal regulation. Some people have the idea that in order for any man to enjoy the benefits of any institution or organization there must be some Federal regulation, but I do not believe in any such doctrine. The point I make is that the confusion and chaotic condition is due largely to the sudden growth in the last year or two. If we pass this bill to-day, probably by next session new legislation will be necessary. There are powers of regulation under existing law which gives authority to regulate in so far as they know how to regulate. It is like an old doctor who only gave quinine. When the patient did not improve he thought he had not given enough. So he gave more and more quinine until the patient either got well or died. You can not cure this confusion by simply passing a bill, especially one that is hurriedly drawn. Let the business develop. Let them use the powers under existing law until the next session and maybe the situation will so clear as to enable us to tell just what legislation is necessary.

Mr. LAZARO. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I decline to yield further just now, as I want to call attention to one or two other things before I go into that. I just want to call the attention of the gentleman to the statement of the committee:

The bill before you is not a comprehensive radio law but is limited in its scope. There are many phases of the subject which invite study and which in the not distant future may call for legislative action.

In another place it says:

The radio art changes overnight. It is neither standardized nor stabilized.

And yet with the condition as it exists we are asked to increase the Federal license and control system and you place it in the hands of one man to say who shall and who shall not engage in this business and who shall absolutely control the situation from top to bottom. In section (b), page 2, the Secretary of Commerce is authorized to license the radio stations and prescribe the nature of the service to be rendered and to make, alter, and revoke regulations applicable to all licensed stations. Now, I want in that connection to call attention to the statement of the committee that—

Apprehension has been expressed—

I want to call attention of this committee to the report of this committee—

Apprehension has been expressed and there is evidence sufficient to raise the question in reasonable minds that certain companies and interests have been endeavoring to establish a monopoly—

I call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois to that statement particularly when he was speaking in so cynical a manner about regulation and monopoly. Here is the committee report.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Where is the gentleman reading?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Page 4 of the committee report.

Apprehension has been expressed, and there is evidence sufficient to raise the question in reasonable minds that certain companies and interests have been endeavoring to establish a monopoly in wireless communications through control and the manufacture and sale of radio instruments through contractual arrangements giving exclusive privileges in the transmission and exchange of messages or through other means.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Now will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. In just a minute. I have not finished reading. I decline to yield now.

Your committee believes that this subject should be carefully investigated and appropriate action considered at an early date.

In other words, according to the committee's own statement, it leaves the question of monopoly practically free and open and leaves to these companies the whole proposition. Now, I believe it would have been fairer and more seeming for you to have brought in a provision that would have curbed a monopoly of this business rather than to bring in 18 pages of Federal regulations and license.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Why does the gentleman call my attention to these words on page 4?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I called attention to the words on page 4 because the gentleman seemed to be very cynical a moment ago when I suggested that under the terms of this bill the big companies would have a chance to monopolize the situation. Now, I quote the unanimous report of the committee, which sustains me. Does the gentleman want any more evidence?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield? The gentleman is wrong. The gentleman from Illinois made no reference to any statement by the gentleman in reference to monopolization.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I so understood him; but perhaps I do not understand the English language.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I will say this to the gentleman, that if the gentleman's views prevail and no legislation had, he is working in the interests of monopolization.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Oh, the gentleman's statement is full of prejudice because the report says that they do not try in any practical way to govern the question of monopoly. Now, we have Federal regulation and yet leave the question of monopoly open, according to the unanimous report.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I do.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I wish to say to my colleague that contrary to what he has stated this bill has a provision inserted in addition to existing law and in a general way it prevents monopolies.

Mr. JONES of Texas. On page 6 it says the Secretary of Commerce is authorized to refuse a station license to any person, company, or corporation which in the judgment of the Secretary is monopolizing or seeks to monopolize radio communication, and substantially that same provision is in the old law. You do not direct the Secretary of Commerce—

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. And also a provision that he may revoke.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I understand that also is in the original law, which is already on the statute books. If the gentleman will read here in the laws of the Sixty-second Congress, pages 302 and 303, he will find this same provision. Why did not they direct the Secretary of Commerce to do these things in the event a monopoly existed?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. As a matter of fact, under existing law and the construction which has been put upon it by the court, if a monopoly existed which applied for the license, the Secretary of Commerce has no authority whatsoever to refuse that license to an admitted monopoly. That is the situation in the existing law.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I have the law before me, and it authorizes the Secretary of Commerce to revoke these licenses for cause, and to make his own regulations and revoke his own licenses whenever he pleases, and the gentleman knows that is true. But I want to get on to another proposition that is in this bill.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. Would the situation of which the gentleman complains be remedied if the bill were to provide that resort may be had to the courts in the event the Secretary of Commerce refuses a license to any transmitting station or operating station?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I think that would help the bill materially, but I think it would still leave it where they would have to have a concern of some importance in order to fight the big companies and pursue the litigation successfully in the courts. You will find that most of the witnesses were connected with the big companies that are now trying to control the whole situation.

Mr. LONDON. Under this bill the control of the whole radio situation is under one man?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes; one man is in the sole control.

Now, under section C, on page 10, there is a provision that an operator's license shall be issued by the Secretary of Commerce in response to a written application, and it sets out the different things that he must show in order to get a license, and then it puts in this provision in subsection E:

An operator's license shall be in such form as the Secretary of Commerce shall prescribe, and may be suspended by him for a period not exceeding two years upon proof sufficient to satisfy him that the licensee has violated any provision of any act or treaty binding on the United States which the Secretary of Commerce is authorized by this act to administer, or of any regulation made by the Secretary under any such act or treaty, or has failed to compel compliance therewith by any unlicensed person under his supervision, or has failed to carry out the lawful orders of the master of a vessel on which he is employed, or has willfully damaged or permitted apparatus to be damaged—

And so forth, and so on, citing a number of instances. Now, if there is one of these little companies or operators who inadvertently violates some of the regulations, the Secretary of Commerce can absolutely put him out of business; he can put him out of business for two years; and, of course, these big companies can have some spies on his trail and find some regulation to show to the Secretary of Commerce that the law is violated; and so by the end of two years they will have him scotched.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Is there any appeal from the decision of the Secretary?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Absolutely none. His decision is final. They can not even go into the courts under this bill. They make Mr. Hoover, who, while an honorable man, is nevertheless more or less ambitious, the sole arbiter, and from his decisions, as you all know, there is very little appeal when he has the final say.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Will Mr. Hoover be Secretary of Commerce forever?

Mr. JONES of Texas. You do not know at any time whether he will be Secretary of Commerce or not, but he has already asked for contributions to his department for more authority and more power, and now he comes in with a bill. Whereas the business was formerly divided between him and the Secretary of Labor, by the present law he wants to be "the whole cheese."

Mr. LINEBERGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. LINEBERGER. Does not the gentleman think the Secretary of Commerce has performed his duties ably?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Well, I have not gone into that matter fully. I admit that he is an able man, but I know he has made some mistakes in his wonderful experience and has done some wonderful things. But I am not willing, at the rate this business is going on, to require every man who is a citizen of this great free country to rush pell-mell into the hands of Federal supervision and require him to take out a license in every detail and leave it to any one man to say who shall and who shall not have the benefit of an institution of this character. This involves the air. I have heard it said frequently that about the only thing that was left free was the air, and now you are going to take that away. [Laughter.]

Mr. BARBOUR. Would not the remedy of mandamus lie here if the Secretary of Commerce abused the discretion vested in him?

Mr. JONES of Texas. It is not so nominated in the bond. He is given the absolute right to make any regulations, whether reasonable or unreasonable, which he sees fit to make, and if anyone violates any one of these regulations he will be put out of commission, or at least for two years.

Mr. BARBOUR. All the authority that he has is given to him by statute.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes; and the proposed statute provides no appeal to the courts in any way whatever. Of course, a man would have a poor chance to go into court, considering all the advantage of the information which the other side would have in trying to make Secretary Hoover do something, or make any other Secretary of Commerce do anything.

Now, the report says:

After the approval of this act the construction of a station for which a license is required by this act shall not be begun, nor shall the construction of a station already begun be continued, until after a permit for its construction has been granted by the Secretary of Commerce upon written application therefor.

A man may be out here with a station almost finished, one of these small concerns, and may have spent most, perhaps, of his capital stock. They can have their station almost finished, and yet if the Secretary of Commerce, in his wisdom and in his almost unlimited power, shall say unto him or them, "Nay, nay," they must throw away the work and the investment they have made, because they are not permitted to conduct their business.

Mr. LONDON. Does the existing law give the Secretary of Commerce an adequate personnel to make such investigations, or will it be necessary to make additional appropriations?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I do not know; but the committee's report says that not only are the big institutions making all sorts of investigations but the Government is making various investigations, and the report says the great technical organizations throughout the country and the amateurs throughout the country are making investigations.

Mr. LONDON. I am speaking of the individual having the right to construct a transmitting station.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I think it is under the general powers of the Secretaries of Commerce and Labor. As I understand it, they have asked for no additional appropriation. I suppose they have such men now as they have found to be necessary in that regard.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. What effect would the putting of this operation into the hands of the Secretary of Commerce absolutely have? What effect would that have on radioing market reports and things of that kind?

Mr. JONES of Texas. If the Secretary of Commerce saw fit to dress down the farmers as he did when he regulated the price of wheat, he could say, "You have already enough market news and you must quit sending market news by radio." Under this bill, if the Secretary of Commerce decided that the people down in some vegetable-raising country were already getting enough for their cabbages or their vegetables or fruit, he might say, "You can not have any more information." Of course, he would probably not do this, but the power would be there, and it should not be so placed unless shown to be absolutely necessary. He might say, "If you violate that regulation I will suspend you." Under the terms of this bill the Secretary of Agriculture would be wholly dependent upon the good graces of the Secretary of Commerce for any information he might want to send out.

Mr. KNUTSON. According to the explanation given by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. WHITE], who, I understand, is one of the authors of the bill, this measure specifically excludes Government broadcasting stations.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Government broadcasting stations, yes; but according to the statement of the chairman of the Subcommittee on Appropriations [Mr. ANDERSON], when we were considering the agricultural bill in the House, practically none of the broadcasting stations operated by the Secretary of Agriculture is owned by the Government. They are private agencies, according to the statement that was made here on the floor of the House. I asked the chairman of the subcommittee when he was on the floor, and he said that the Government was using only four broadcasting stations under the direction of the Secretary of Agriculture, and I believe he said some of them were leased.

Mr. KNUTSON. How many stations is the Department of Agriculture using?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I do not know how many are being used. I do not understand the details of all these matters. I know that the statement of the man who ought to know was that the most of the agricultural information was being sent out by private broadcasting stations.

Mr. BLANTON. He said there were only four transmitting stations.

Mr. KNUTSON. How many private stations are being used by the Government? Probably we could save money by cutting some of them out.

Mr. JONES of Texas. We might do that.

Mr. McKENZIE. The gentleman will concede, will he not, that control over these stations should be vested in some authority?

Mr. JONES of Texas. The point I want to make most strongly is that already we have a law that seems to be operating very well. The committee advocates a change which they confess leaves the subject in a great degree of confusion—a proposed measure, which they confess is not comprehensive, which they confess does not handle the most important propositions in connection with this matter. Why act by piecemeal? When this industry is developing so rapidly, why not wait until we can get some more definite information?

Mr. McKENZIE. The gentleman's colleague [Mr. GARRETT of Texas] asked a very pertinent question, and we all agree that the transmission of market reports is very essential and necessary to the agricultural interests of the country.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. Does not the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] believe that authority should be vested somewhere to control radio broadcasting? For instance, a radio station might be transmitting some song-and-dance performance going on at a vaudeville show, and thereby interfere with the transmission of this necessary information.

Mr. JONES of Texas. That is true, but the trouble is that they already have more power under existing law than is being used. I am not willing to risk his judgment as to which is the more important.

Mr. BLANTON. Suppose the Secretary of Commerce should deem the song and dance vaudeville transmission more important than the subject that the gentleman is interested in?

Mr. McKENZIE. He would not do that.

Mr. BLANTON. We have different kinds of individuals in the various Cabinet offices once in a while.

Mr. McKENZIE. I will suggest to the gentleman from Texas that this at least would prevent confusion.

Mr. JONES of Texas. The Secretary of Commerce and the Secretary of Labor have that very power at the present time, and if this change went through it would not clarify that situation one "bit" in the world.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I want to call attention to paragraph D of section 1:

Radio stations belonging to and operated by the United States shall not be subject to the provisions of paragraphs A and B of this section.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Shall not be subject to paragraphs A and B of this section.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The President assigns wave lengths to the departments of the Government.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes; the President assigns wave lengths to the departments of the Government, but he does not assign the wave lengths to the big companies, and they can go ahead with their business even though it interferes with market news or anything else; and the Government plants under the terms of the present law, I will say to the gentleman, are exempted from its operations, so that this is simply carrying forward the provisions of existing law. The point I am making is that it is unwise at the present time to interfere with the present law.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I want to reply to the remark that this bill would interfere with the Agricultural Department. That is not the case unless the President wants to interfere.

Mr. JONES of Texas. It is not possible under the present law, but it would be possible for the Secretary of Commerce to interfere under the proposed bill, if he desired to do it. It would be possible for him to interfere under this proposed bill.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. It would not.

Mr. JONES of Texas. It most certainly would. Sections A and B are not the only sections in this bill. And even if the Government plants were operating and they were sending this market news, that would not keep outside companies from sending messages that conflicted and interfered with the transmission of market news. That is the point I am making. Now, let us just refer again to the report of the committee, where it says, speaking of the growth of this business, that since July 1 the number of stations has increased from 17,000 to 21,000. It is growing at a rapid pace, and the thing is changing overnight according to the statements of the committee, and they say themselves that statute laws can not be speedily changed, and that of necessity there is no way of meeting this unprecedented situation except by conferring in general terms broad powers of supervision, of regulation, and of control upon the designated regulatory body. That is what they are trying to do, to give broad comprehensive powers that place the whole thing in the hands and brain of one man.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. The committee say on page 4, speaking of the apprehension with reference to monopoly—

Your committee believes that this subject should be carefully investigated and appropriate action considered at an early date.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Then they say that the committee can not do that, and they turn it over to Mr. Hoover.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes. I thank the gentleman for his suggestion. If you will read this remarkable report, I believe you will agree that this bill should be recommittees; that you should let it ride until the next Congress, when we can take the facts we have in our possession and get up a bill that is a bill, if we need such a thing.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. If we do pass such a bill, should we not have a provision exempting stations authorized by the Secretary of Agriculture, if we are going to exempt anything?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I think most certainly they should not be allowed to be interfered with in the manner suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McKENZIE]. But now, as my colleague has suggested, the committee says it has not the information to frame a comprehensive bill, it has not the facts, it is unable to get the facts, and they are going to leave it to Mr. Hoover, and at the same time they say that this bill is not a comprehensive law but is limited in its scope and have embodied in the bill only certain provisions.

Now, listen. In connection with that they confess, on page 4, that they have not undertaken to deal in any way with the most important provisions of the bill—the question of monopoly. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time, and I yield 15 minutes to my colleague from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, peace time as far as the Government has attempted to control transportation, it is that only which relates to interstate commerce; with regard to telegraph and telephone control it has the same rule. With the control of the telegraph and telephone it applies only from one State to another; interstate and not intrastate. The Government does not interfere in any manner whatever in Pennsylvania with the railroad business that is embraced wholly within the State lines. It does not interfere in any way with the telegraph and telephone in Pennsylvania that is embraced only within the State lines; it is only as to interstate telegraph and telephone and railroad transportation that it assumes any control, but when it comes to radio business the rule changes, according to this bill.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The gentleman is wrong, and he will see it if he reads the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. I have not only read the bill but have carefully studied it as much as any Member of Congress. Let me read a sentence or two.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. All right.

Mr. BLANTON. On page 2, line 1, what does it say? It says "or for the transmission of radiograms or signals the effect of which extends beyond the jurisdiction of the State, Territory, or the District of Columbia in which the same originate, or where interference would be caused thereby with the transmission or reception of messages or signals from beyond the jurisdiction of said State," and so forth. How easy is it for the Secretary of Commerce, who wants to control the proposition in Pennsylvania or in Illinois or in Minnesota or in Texas or California or in any other State—how easy it is for him to say that a little radio transmission station at Dallas, that does business with El Paso, Tex., interferes with a station up in California or Utah or New York.

Mr. BARBOUR. Will the gentleman yield? I am interested in the gentleman's proposition. When you send out a radiogram there is a station 1,000 miles away which gets it and another perhaps 100 miles away does not get it. Where does the gentleman draw the line?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, the gentleman's State is a State of long distances.

Mr. BARBOUR. In one direction.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; and the State of Texas is 900 miles across it from east to west and 1,000 miles across it from north to south; it is an empire within itself. There are stations where there could be private businesses in intrastate scope that would not interfere with Kansas, Oklahoma, Louisiana, Colorado, New Mexico, or any other close-by State.

Oh, they say, we can depend on the Secretary of Commerce and his good judgment, because he is a Cabinet officer. I want to say to my friends on the other side of the aisle that the man who had more to do than anyone else with putting you in power right now in the Executive office and in the control of Congress and in the conduct of the affairs of this Nation, the man who has had more to do in bringing your party in power, the ex-Postmaster General, Mr. Hays, has lately taken a stand that has shocked the morals of the whole country. The men and women's clubs generally are standing up and denouncing the action recently taken by him. You can not always depend on the judgment of a man who occupies a high position and depend on what it may be in the next 5 or 10 years.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. In a minute. I do not believe that the gentleman from Minnesota has studied the bill as I have. He is the Republican whip of the floor, and is exercising his functions in trying to whip out every man who stands against a measure brought in by the administration. I have studied this bill from a legislative standpoint, from the standpoint of what it means to the people at home all over the United States and what it means to my home people in Texas. I want the Government to exercise every proper right of control over anything that affects the whole country, but I do not want it to interfere with matters that are exclusively for Minnesota, for California, or for Texas, and with which it has no concern and which the people of these respective States are able to control and regulate themselves.

The gentleman from Illinois says that there is no big machinery here, and says it provides for an advisory committee of 15 men. Oh, but you are also giving each one clerical help.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I will say for myself and, I think, for the rest of the committee, that we are entirely indifferent as to that provision and are willing to strike it out.

Mr. BLANTON. It ought to be stricken out. If you will strike out that provision and will then make it plain that the proper jurisdiction of the States is safeguarded in this bill, I will be with you.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I am willing to have it stricken out, and the result will be that the men will have to spend their own time at their own expense.

Mr. BLANTON. We, as 435 Members of Congress, have access to all the scientific and technical knowledge of the world. We can assimilate it and use it to advantage of the people in this country just as well as any bureau can. What is there about the Secretary of State's office that has to do with technical science? It is scientific technical knowledge that we need on this matter.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I want to say to the gentleman and for the Record that this provision of an advisory committee was put into the bill because everybody from the amateur to the manufacturer requested the committee to create such an advisory commission, upon which they might have membership.

Mr. BLANTON. Why did you not give the Secretary of Labor a little spiel at it? Why did you not let him get a slice of the pie and also put a man on the advisory committee.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The Secretary of Labor does not use radio.

Mr. BLANTON. Why not? He is in charge of the whole Immigration Bureau? You have put every other Cabinet officer there. Why should you put the Shipping Board upon it?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Why there is a representative from the Shipping Board.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, I do not want the gentleman to bother me too much.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I am answering the gentleman's question.

Mr. BLANTON. Let us see what this advisory committee is going to cost. Twenty-five dollars a day, when they are on business. My judgment is that they will be on business 365 days in the year, and that will amount to $9,125 each annually.

Mr. McARTHUR. Sundays and holidays?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes. Take all of these so-called innocent little commissions that we so frequently create and provide for and they get paid for 365 days in the year, most of them, together with their expenses and their clerical help and everything else that goes with the establishment of a big, expensive bureau, and that is to be placed upon the already overburdened shoulders of the people of this country.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. In order that the gentleman may have time to discuss other matters, I will state that the committee will move to strike out that part of the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Thank the Lord for that.
Mr. BUTLER. Was there not some reason why you put it there?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. Then let us leave it there. The amateur people want it.

Mr. BLANTON. I will tell you what you ought to do as to the advisory committee. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM] usually gives close thought to every proposition that comes up, and I think he ought to let the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of State, from a diplomatic standpoint, the Postmaster General, and the Secretary of the Treasury, besides the Secretary of Commerce, designate each a man, the best scientist, with technical knowledge, from their several departments to act as this advisory committee. It will not then cost the Government much, it will not increase the expenses of the Government, and you will not build up a new bureau with this extensive machinery. Let them be the advisory committee. I will promise you that the Navy and the Army, that have already given great study to this question, will give their best to the situation, and so will the other departments. Let me remind my friend from Illinois that for two years after the armistice he knows how hard it was to get a license or permission for some little private enterprise to use radio transmission. He could not get it in Illinois, he could not get it in Texas, he could not get it in California. I had a little business concern down in Texas that wanted to use transmission by radio from Dallas to El Paso, wholly within the State, a legitimate business, and they could not do it for about three years after the armistice was signed. You want to go slow on taking the inherent power that naturally belongs to the States of this country away from them and lodging it in a centralized government here in Washington controlled by one man, no matter how bright or big or fundamentally important he may be to any political party.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, as I stated before, I am interested in this proposition. Is it possible to confine radio broadcasting within the limits of a State? If it is, then I am in favor of the gentleman's proposition.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes and no. There are certain little businesses that have occasion to use small transmission stations, that are not interfering with the big radio business of the world. They ought to be held intact, they ought not to be interfered with within the States. They ought not to be required to come to Washington and run the gauntlet of the wire fences that the big corporations that want to control this business will put in their way. The evidence shows that one of the biggest Army men we have in the Nation is about to be retired in a few days to go as the head of one of the biggest corporations in existence, having to do with radio business. Why? To control the business, if possible, for that corporation. You want to watch all these little foot tracks that lead up to this great monopoly. This bill may satisfy you, as with proper limitations it would satisfy me, and with proper limitations such as I have suggested I would vote for it gladly, because there must be some supervision, but we should watch all of these little things.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to my colleague on the committee [Mr. ROSENBLUM].

Mr. ROSENBLUM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, and to do this in 8-point type.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, the gentleman asks that the extension might be in 8-point type. I understand that the extension of remarks are ordinarily put in 8-point type, the ordinary type of the RECORD. Does the gentleman anticipate inserting documents of some kind?

Mr. ROSENBLUM. No; but having my remarks extended in the back of the RECORD in the ordinary type.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROSENBLUM. Mr. Chairman, as the result of a campaign of misleading propaganda, it is my opinion that the proposed amendment to the Constitution will pass the House. Although many well-intentioned people, and, I dare say, Members of the House of Representatives, have been beguiled into favoring the bill on the widely advertised theory that it has for its object and sole purpose preventing the investment of large incomes in tax-exempt securities, by means of which such incomes escaped an equitable share of taxation, I am firmly convinced that this much-desired object will be defeated by adoption of the pending amendment.

If it were possible to prevent money accumulations from escaping their fair share of taxation by the ratification of the amendment under consideration, I pledge that no one would be more industrious, eager, or conscientious in his effort toward this accomplishment than myself.

The prevalent opinion that the adoption of this amendment will reach securities already issued is unjustified and untrue. Such securities will continue to be tax exempt. There is no legal way in which they can be reached. The contemplated amendment only provides for such securities as shall be issued after its ratification.

"A man is known by the company he keeps." Let me digress far enough to add that a legislative proposal can be most certainly identified and characterized by its advocates.

Why is it that the same gentlemen who one short year ago were exhausting their energy to secure reduction of income taxes on incomes in excess of $67,000 a year, at the expense of incomes under $67,000 a year, are now so devoted to their "professed" interest in the people generally that they use the same majority of people whom they proposed to tax more heavily as the cat's-paw of their argument that the proposed amendment should be adopted. Truly "a leopard can not change his spots"—at least, not so easily and quickly. Is it consistent to believe that those same gentlemen, who a year ago argued for a reduction of tax on enormous incomes should now be so eagerly championing an amendment whose sole intent and object is to collect a greater amount of taxes from those same inflated incomes? "Verily, do I hear the voice of Jacob, but I feel the hand of Esau."

Where did the money come from that has previously been invested in tax-exempt securities? These incomes are received as dividends from industrial stocks, from oil stocks, automobile stocks—speculation. They are most certainly not the result of conservative bond investment, yielding a far more moderate return of interest on the investment. It is therefore patent that all securities—including the tax-exempt security under discussion—was infinitely less profitable and attractive than the profits to be derived from further speculation. Why, then, is this money invested in these tax-exempt securities? I am satisfied that there is no desire on the part of possessors of large incomes to invest them in tax-exempt securities unless forced to do so by high rates of income tax. Those securities constitute an entirely safe investment, devoid of the speculative dangers attendant upon speculative stock investment. Allowing for the safety in the security investment, the factor that determines is the rate of return. When the rate of return from the bond investment, plus the advantage from tax-exemption, approximates the return from speculative stocks, minus the necessary deduction for payment of taxes, accumulated wealth immediately absorbs the issues of tax-exempt securities, not necessarily because they are tax exempt but because of the advantage of increased safety in the knowledge that the net return from such investment will be substantially the same as would accrue from speculative investment after allowing for deductions for payment of taxes as result of such investment.

These same gentlemen who are now asking the adoption of this amendment, when the income tax bill was under consideration by the House gave every assurance that if the excess-profits tax and other surtaxes were eliminated or reduced it would eliminate the practice of accumulated wealth seeking refuge in tax-exempt securities. Accepting their assurances, this Congress gave them the relief they sought. Why do they now come before you and say it is necessary to stop the issuance of tax-exempt securities in order to accomplish the result they predicted in the first instance? Why is the adoption of this amendment so heartily urged by the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee; by Mr. Kuhn, of Kuhn, Loeb & Co.; by Mr. Mellon, Mr. Ford, et al.? Because, gentlemen, the continued attractiveness of these tax-exempt securities, wherein a goodly portion of their money sought refuge and where it now remains, is no longer to their liking. Immediately a tax is added to further issues of such securities their holdings will automatically increase in value to the extent of the tax. The economic condition of the country's business has reached a point where speculative industrial investment can not compete with the security and assured return to be had from investment in such securities. As previously stated, these wealthy gentlemen accumulated their wealth almost entirely as a result of the speculative investment which they largely control and manipulate. But, if people will not invest in industrials, there is nothing for them either to control or manipulate, consequently there is no profit, and again, consequently, they seek to make the issue of tax-exempt security less attractive, so that investment will again be made through their favored mediums.

You are asked by the captains of industry, financial experts, and international bankers to adopt this amendment in the benefit of the country at large, so that accumulated wealth will be assessed its proportionate share of taxation on these securities. Whence all this philanthropy and noble altruism professed from such a source? Are not all of the actors in this play cast in strange and unfamiliar rôles? It is indeed difficult to digest such a paradox. Never before have I witnessed the spectacle of accumulated wealth seeking to have itself taxed in order that it might more equitably share the common burden.

I am conscientiously wrong and will unceasingly regret my mistake in opposing the adoption of this amendment if the purpose really be to tax colossal wealth its just, fair, and equitable proportion by denying to it the refuge of the tax-exempt security.

But if it be the purpose of those who advocate this measure to discontinue such securities so that the money will be invested in industrial securities, why do they not say so?

If it be the purpose to so arrange State and municipal securities that, with less attractiveness and advantages, the interest rates can be dictated by the financiers of Wall Street in order to make them salable, why do they not say so?

If it be the object to so encompass these securities that they will no longer find a ready market, and the issues must be marketed by these same gentlemen who now seek to tax them and make them less attractive to the purchaser, why do they not say so?

If it is the purpose to prevent the Federal Government, the various States, and the municipalities from engaging in what has been regarded as the sanctum sanctorum of private business—the building of elevators, furnishing heat, light, and power, transportation, and other essentials of urban civilization—why do they not say so?

But if it be the purpose of those advocating this measure to compel these various States issuing bonds for road-building purposes to so embarrass the sale of those bonds by removing the tax-exempt feature, in order to retard the road-building program, and by so doing minimize the competition that they are developing to the railroads of our country, why do they not say so? My own State, having authorized $50,000,000 of such bonds to be sold during the course of the next few years, I can not see my way clear to lend my vote to raise the rate of interest which we will have to pay, or to restrict the market that there is for those securities under present conditions.

Gentlemen, I do not charge that these are the objects of the advocates of this amendment. It would be indeed a dismal effort for me to interrupt or interfere with the noble spectacle of wealth seeking to tax itself, but I must admit I am quite overcome by such altruistic sentiment from such a source.

But, gentlemen, I do charge that such things as I have enumerated are susceptible of accomplishment, and are easily possible, with the proposed amendment in force.

I am quite certain, however, that if either or all of the above propositions had been presented to you as arguments for the adoption of this amendment, it would have received but scanty consideration. It is indeed cleverly masked. If I can analyze the sentiment of the membership of this House, there is an overwhelming desire to place taxation on the sources best able to bear the tax. In this view I am confident the amendment will be passed. I am equally confident, however, that the sheepskin will be firmly, if not gently, removed from the wolf in the Senate and the proposition will be viewed in its true aspects.

I can not approve of a policy which will deliver into the hands of the capitalists controlling the money markets the power to dictate the rates of interest at which my constituents can secure money for permanent physical improvements of their localities. If the people of Wheeling, or Fairmont, or Grafton, in the State of West Virginia, wish to build a road and thus add to the capital of their respective community, and the proposal is submitted to a vote of those concerned and receives an indorsement of the necessary two-thirds majority, indicating their desire for and willingness to pay for the new roadway, I believe they should be permitted to secure the necessary money as the result of a bond issue under the most favorable conditions. Such permanent physical improvement—the only enterprise for which they are entitled to issue municipal bonds, by sanction of two-thirds majority of the people concerned—are assets and capital not only to the community but to the Nation.

The bonds issued will be paid. They have the best obtainable security—the pledge of two-thirds of the residents and property owners of a given locality. The Nation is benefited to the extent of the tax which purely industrial speculations must bear. Why should additional taxes be heaped not upon the bonds but upon the people? With a tax-exempt security they could find a ready market at 4 or 4½ per cent. By eliminating the tax-exempt provision they would have to return a sufficiently higher income to recompense for the amount of tax they bear in order to meet competition and to find a market. At best, the market would be difficult to find. At least, the interest rate which the people would be compelled to pay would immediately advance from 4½ to 6½ or 7 per cent. In the absence of a ready market it might be necessary to submit the entire issue to these gentlemen who are asking you to do away with tax-exempt securities.

This would add an additional and expensive service to be extracted from the amount of the issue calculated to build the contemplated improvement. This creates additional tax for the people of those communities. Who is benefited? In this instance there is a minimum cost at which the road can be built—the lowest cost. But you have proceeded to add additional costs with amazing rapidity, so that there will be a sizable difference between the lowest cost and the cost at which the road will actually be completed. This has occurred in the financial end of the transaction. The gentlemen who wish tax-exempt securities eliminated control that end.

The reciprocal provision of this amendment permitting the States to tax Federal bonds to be issued in the future is buncombe, pure and simple. Nothing is more remote than the issuance of further bonds by the United States Government.

While I am unalterably opposed to prohibiting the issue of tax-exempt securities, I would energetically support an equitable law prohibiting any individual, firm, partnership, corporation, or combination from holding more than a stated amount of such securities. This would insure a wider distribution of such issues and prevent hoarding money in such investment solely with the object of evading taxation.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes, my remaining time, to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY].

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I think I shall take but a small portion of that time, first, to state that after several years of study—for this question has not come up anew—the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries have investigated the subject of this bill, and with mature deliberation have reached a conclusion that this measure is the best that we can do at the present time. Modestly we have stated that we are unable to forecast the future and to provide for all the rules and regulations that may be necessary for the future in this growing and developing invention and discovery, and we have suggested that as time progresses it will be necessary to provide other legislation. That modesty seems to have provoked a vast attack on the part of two gentlemen who have represented the opposition to the bill. I appreciate very greatly the sincerity of the gentleman from Maine, who makes the modest statement in the report, and I want to say frankly there is not a man in the United States, perhaps, who understands radio better than the gentleman from Maine [Mr. WHITE]. [Applause.]

It has been his duty for at least six months in unceasing investigation, and this bill is largely the result of his labor. But I must not forget to say that he has been assisted on the subcommittee by the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS], the Member from Virginia [Mr. BLAND], and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD]. And I do not think any more conscientious men, any men who are more loathe to bestow unnecessary power upon an official of the Government could be found, and yet they found it was necessary to lodge somewhere the power to control the chaotic conditions which now prevail in the radio service, and they have placed it largely in the Secretary of Commerce. Now, the next complaint which has been made by the two gentlemen is that this advisory committee is not small enough. The Secretary of Commerce was one, and that was an objection and—

Mr. ABERNETHY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I have only a few minutes.

Mr. ABERNETHY. As a matter of explanation. Do I understand the Secretary of Commerce will have the power by regulation of wave lengths to cut anybody off from using the air unless there is something wrong in what they are going to say or not?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. No; the Secretary of Commerce will prescribe the wave length that can be used by each licensed transmitting station, and it is absolutely necessary that somebody prescribe it, otherwise you would have interference and chaos in the air. Here in Washington not long ago two ministers were preaching with radio distribution service at their pulpits. They had the same wave lengths, and nobody could hear what either one was saying. It is to prevent that.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Does he arrange so that both can talk at the same time and not interfere with each other?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. That is the purpose, to regulate the radio wave length.

Mr. ABERNETHY. And there is nothing that does away with the ancient saying, "As free as the air."

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Nothing, except you have not got the right to blow your breath in another man's face if your breath is foul. [Laughter.] That is about the limitation we put here on this matter now. Now, in regard to the matter of complaint about the advisory committee provided in this bill in section 5. What does that advisory committee have any right to do? It has the right to investigate and report, first, upon the administration or need for changes in the laws, regulations, and treaties of the United States relating to radio communications; second, the study of the scientific problems involved in radio communication, with a view of furthering its development; and, third, the scientific progress in radio communication and the use of radio communication. This is the greatly criticized advisory committee which may be appointed in order to study the science of radio and in order to investigate the laws touching the subject and suggest to the Congress what would be wise and proper legislation in the future. Now, I want to say another thing. As to that advisory committee, on page 14 there was a provision authorizing a certain payment of certain expenditures. It had not been thoroughly investigated, or thoroughly investigated as to some particulars; and some Members consulted with the chairman of the committee and with the leading Members on the majority side of the committee before this debate began and agreed that lines 1 to 8, page 14, should be stricken from the bill, so that there will be no expense on the Government arising out of the appointment and existence of this advisory committee. This advisory committee consists of representatives of the Navy, War, of the Departments of Agriculture, Post Office, Commerce, the Shipping Board—departments of the Government that are really interested largely in radio—and each one of them appoints a member on the advisory committee who, with this section stricken out, will serve without compensation, and the Secretary of Commerce will then select from those who are intimately acquainted—the engineers, the manufacturers, and others—seven additional members who will advise with these official advisory members, and all of them to serve without pay.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Yes, sir.

Mr. TILSON. I agree with the gentleman that it would be better to cut out the per diem and clerical expenses, but does not the gentleman believe that it would be better to allow the members of the advisory committee actual expenses while attending meetings of the committee? Unless you do it you will be limiting it to those enthusiasts in radio who can afford to pay all their expenses.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. To those and the officials of the Government.

Mr. TILSON. I do not think that the officials of the Government should be paid anything at all beyond the salary they are already receiving.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I do not think you will find anybody but the radio enthusiasts who will voluntarily go and fill these appointments under any circumstances unless you pay them more than their expenses.

Mr. TILSON. I do not think that you should pay them for their services. I would include the enthusiasts, but not alone the wealthy enthusiasts. I would include anybody who is qualified and willing to give up some of his time to this work.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. You would pay the actual expenses?

Mr. TILSON. Yes; I would pay actual expenses.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I might not object to that, but this is legislation that we admit is temporary. Radio is a science which we admit is growing and is now in its infancy, and we contend that Congress from time to time must perfect and add to this legislation.

Our very frankness in making that admission has been used as a weapon against the committee, who have conscientiously tried to bring in the best measure they can. That is the whole situation. We have tried conscientiously and honestly to discharge the duties we have under the law, but we admit that it is a new subject. It is a broad field. It is a growing enterprise. Legislation must from time to time be necessary.

Then I want to call attention to another fact. We have limited the length of time for which a license may be issued, so that there is no chance under this bill for the Government to make a commitment that would create permanent vested rights, and any Congress that may come hereafter can correct any error that there may be in this bill and not be met with the suggestion that something has been granted that can not be taken back. We have guarded this carefully so that no man may have a sending monopoly. Every succeeding Congress can take away any unjust right or unfair advantage, and the whole people may be served by this most wonderful invention of the age. In the meantime, let us stop the chaos that is ruling the air to-day and interfering with the young giant that will rule the future. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, my response to what my colleague has said is that the conditions depicted in the committee's report do not justify legislation at this time. The committee itself says this is not a final bill and says it is impossible to cure some of the conditions that exist. They say, "Your committee should take appropriate action at an early date," and so on.

My colleague [Mr. HARDY] refers to the advisory committee of all these Cabinet officers. I want to call attention to the fact that they are simply an advisory committee, and after all, under the terms of this bill, the Secretary of Commerce holds the absolute reins of power. He does not have to follow their advice. He is under no compulsion whatever. He may accept their advice if he pleases, or he may reject it. I am not willing to take his or any other one man's opinion as to who is to make a sound and who is not to make a sound for the whole people of the United States.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. This advisory committee is intended to make a report that will be for the use of Congress and of the officers as well. It is for information; that is all.

Mr. JONES of Texas. According to the committee's statement there are all kinds of Government officials, as well as employees of the big companies, who are making thorough investigations and studies, and I think the Cabinet officers would simply make a résumé of the opinions of others.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I am frank to say that I do not know who would be the best constituent members of the committee to investigate, but I think when you clothe the officers of the Government and the departments of the Government with authority to act as advisers we can authorize the Secretary to appoint others, and then you will get a satisfactory investigation and report to Congress.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Perhaps there is no great danger at present, except in the appropriation for the per diem, and so forth. But there are to be some other members besides the Cabinet officers, and judging from the history of bureaus heretofore created and established, there will soon be an expensive aggregation of clerks, employees, and other officials connected with any institution of this kind.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Is the gentleman opposed to anybody attempting to regulate this subject or issue licenses or determine who shall operate transmitting stations?

Mr. JONES of Texas. That is an academic question, because the present law authorizes the Secretary of Commerce and the Secretary of Labor to do that very thing. I was not here when the present law was presented and do not know what discussion was had on it at that time, and I have not had the time to go into it very thoroughly. But I say I am making no effort to repeal the present law, and am making no criticism of the present law. It is a good law, no doubt; I have no information to the contrary on the subject. But I say the proposed law does not improve the old law. What I am criticizing particularly is the proposal to create a new commission.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. CROWTHER. The gentleman referred in his other address to the danger of monopoly that exists in this legislation, but he neglected to say what sort of monopoly it would be, or what it would be about or of. How about that?

Mr. JONES of Texas. This bill requires a license for every operating and transmitting station. They must secure a license. Every operator must have a license. The Secretary of Commerce is authorized to make any sort of regulation he sees fit governing this whole activity from top to bottom. It is all in his hands. I made the statement that he would necessarily have to depend in his action largely upon information furnished by those engaged in the business. I took the committee's own report and commented on the statement there, that there was a tendency on the part of some of the companies to try to secure a monopoly, or at least that the facts raised the question, and they did not undertake to deal with it in this bill.

Mr. CROWTHER. The monopoly you are afraid of is a monopoly in commercial sending?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes; a monopoly covering the whole field.

Mr. CROWTHER. Do you not think this legislation is in behalf of the "listeners in" rather than anybody else?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I think the present law takes just as much care of the receiving station as does the proposed law. The proponents of the bill say this does not affect the receiving stations.

Mr. CROWTHER. There is no question about that.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I think it interferes with them at least as much as the present law does.

Mr. CROWTHER. If the gentleman had participated any in the pleasures of listening in and fooling with the thing, as I have done with a little crystal set, and from 10 o'clock on had not been able to get anything on account of the pig-pigging and jabbing in of others—

Mr. JONES of Texas. In my judgment, they are fixing to make it worse.

Mr. CROWTHER. Oh, the gentleman does not know anything about what he is talking about when he says it will make it worse.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I do know what I am talking about, and I read it in the original bill, and the gentleman has not read the original bill, because it gives the Secretary of Commerce and the Secretary of Labor the power to regulate.

Mr. CROWTHER. His regulation is going to improve it. The gentleman started his speech with an apology by saying he did not know anything about the bill, and he has taken 40 minutes to prove it.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Not only does the original bill provide for that, but this measure would authorize the Secretary to put it in the hands of certain ones, outside of Government functions, to send any messages they desire to send, just so they comply with the regulations of one man. The gentleman makes assertions that are not borne out by the facts, that are not akin to the facts, and that do not relate to the facts in any way, and that show he does not understand the subject, even though he may have memorized some technical terms that refer to it.

I want to have time to read one other matter in order to correct the gentleman. He said he had read the report and that there was nothing in it which referred to monopoly. I just want to read what the committee says in its report:

Apprehension has been expressed, and there is evidence sufficient to raise the question in reasonable minds, that certain companies and interests have been endeavoring to establish a monopoly in wireless communication through control of the manufacture and sale of radio instruments, through contractual arrangements giving exclusive privileges in the transmission and exchange of messages or through other means.

Now, the gentleman says that would be taken care of in the proposed bill. But read what the committee says:

Your committee believes that this subject should be carefully investigated and appropriate action considered at an early date. But the committee was unanimously of the opinion that it was impossible during the life of this Congress to inform itself as to the facts involved, and that it would be unwise in the extreme to propose ill-considered legislation on so important a subject.

Yet they turn right around and propose a bill of 18 pages that is about as ill-advised as any bill that I have ever seen presented to Congress.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman jump down about five or six lines and read a little more from the report?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I do not care to read the entire report. I have read the parts that are pertinent to the proposition.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield to me while I read it?

Mr. JONES of Texas. No; I do not care to yield to the gentleman in any way.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. You do not want it in the RECORD?

Mr. JONES of Texas. The whole report is a matter of record, and the gentleman knows that it is a matter of record, and can be obtained by any gentleman who desires to send to the Clerk's desk to get it.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. In all fairness, does not the gentleman think the other parts of the report should be read in this connection?

Mr. JONES of Texas. If the gentleman appeals to me on that basis, I can not resist. The report says:

Your committee felt that it ought not to delay presenting to the House for action the important proposals contained in this bill, with respect to which the Members are in complete harmony. The bill is not, therefore, an antitrust statute.

Is that as far as the gentleman wants me to read?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. No; you are coming to it now.

Mr. JONES of Texas. How much time have I remaining, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas has one minute remaining.

Mr. JONES of Texas. The report says:

There are included in it, however, several provisions which it is believed will have a restraining influence upon those who otherwise might disregard public right and interest.

That is simply an argument.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Read on.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I want to read in that connection—

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Read on; read on; you are just coming to the point.

Mr. JONES of Texas. The gentleman said 5 or 6 lines. I have read 10 or 12 lines. I want to read now on page 3.

The bill before you is not a comprehensive radio law but is limited in its scope. There are many phases of the subject which invite study and which in the not distant future may call for legislative action.

The committee confesses that the business is growing under the present law; that they have a licensing system that is in the hands of two different departments; that the business is being carried on and growing by leaps and bounds. They come in here with some legislation, which they confess is inadequate, which they confess does not cover the entire field, which they confess does not take care of the antitrust feature of the law, and which they confess practically by the terms of their report is not legislation such as will take care of this growing institution.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time in general debate has expired. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of Congress entitled "An act to regulate radio communication," approved August 13, 1912, be amended by striking out sections 1, 2, and 3 thereof and by inserting in lieu thereof the sections 1, 2, and 3 following:

"SECTION 1. A. No person, company, or corporation within the jurisdiction of the United States shall use or operate any apparatus for radio communication as a means of intercourse among the several States or with foreign nations, or upon any vessel of the United States engaged in interstate or foreign commerce, or for the transmission of radiograms or signals the effects of which extend beyond the jurisdiction of the State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, in which the same originate, or where interference would be caused thereby with the transmission or reception of messages or signals from beyond the jurisdiction of said State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, except under and in accordance with a license in that behalf granted by the Secretary of Commerce and except as hereinafter authorized.

"B. The Secretary of Commerce from time to time shall (a) classify licensed radio stations and the operators required therein; (b) prescribe the nature of the service to be rendered by each class of licensed station and assign bands of wave lengths thereto; (c) make, alter, and revoke regulations applicable to all licensed stations not inconsistent with this act or any other act of Congress or with the terms, binding on the United States, of any radio communication convention to which the United States is a party, concerning the service to be rendered by each class of stations so established; the location of any station; the wave lengths to be used by any station; the kind of instruments or apparatus in any station with respect to the external effect produced thereby; the power and the purity and sharpness of the waves of each station or the apparatus therein; the area to be served by any station and the times and methods of operating any station or the apparatus therein; (d) make such other regulations not inconsistent with law as he may deem necessary to prevent interference between all stations affected by this act. The Secretary shall have authority to exclude from the requirements of any regulations any radio station and the operators required therein, or to modify the same in his discretion, in any case in which he shall find that such action will facilitate commerce and will not be incompatible with the public interest.

"C. Every such license shall provide that the President of the United States, in time of war or public peril or disaster, may cause the closing of any station for radio communication and the removal therefrom of all radio apparatus, or may authorize the use or control of any such station or apparatus by any department of the Government, upon just compensation to the owners.

"D. Radio stations belonging to and operated by the United States shall not be subject to the provisions of paragraphs A and B of this section. All such Government stations shall use such wave lengths as shall be assigned to each by the President. All such stations, except stations on board naval and other Government vessels while at sea or beyond the limits of the continental United States, when transmitting any message other than a message relating to Government business, shall conform to such rules and regulations designed to prevent interference with other radio stations and the rights of others as the Secretary of Commerce may prescribe: Provided, That upon proclamation by the President that there exists war or a threat of war or a state of public peril or disaster or other emergency, the President may suspend or amend, for such time as he may see fit, the rules and regulations applicable to any or all stations within the jurisdiction of the United States. All stations owned and operated by the United States and all other stations on land and sea shall have special call letters designated by the Secretary of Commerce, and such stations and the designated call letters shall be included in the list of radio stations of the United States as published by the Department of Commerce. Radio stations on board vessels of the United States Shipping Board or the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation shall not be deemed to belong to or to be operated by the United States or to be Government stations within the meaning and for the purposes of this act.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. MADDEN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message in writing from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House of Representatives that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

On January 12, 1923:

H. R. 10531. An act to distribute the commissioned line and engineer officers of the Coast Guard in grades, and for other purposes.

On January 15, 1923:

H. R. 12170. An act to revive and reenact the act entitled "An act to authorize the commissioners of Lycoming County, Pa., and their successors in office, to construct a bridge across the West Branch of the Susquehanna River from the foot of Arch Street, in the city of Williamsport, Lycoming County, Pa., to the borough of Duboistown, Lycoming County, Pa.," approved August 11, 1916.

On January 22, 1923:

H. R. 966. An act for the relief of the Tacoma Tug & Barge Co.;

H. R. 7658. An act to amend the act approved August 25, 1919, entitled "An act for the relief of contractors and subcontractors for the post offices and other buildings and work under the supervision of the Treasury Department, and for other purposes";

H. R. 13374. An act making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes; and

H. R. 13615. An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and prior fiscal years, to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes.

TO REGULATE RADIO COMMUNICATION.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] a few moments ago, reading from the report of the committee, stopped at the very point where I wanted him to begin. The committee, as was stated by another member of the subcommittee, I think very modestly, disclaimed any purpose in this bill to cover the whole subject of radio legislation. We also stated very frankly that we did not try to cover the whole realm of trust legislation as applied to radio communication. The report, however, on page 4, contains this language:

This bill is not, therefore, an antitrust statute. There are included in it, however, several provisions which it is believed will have a restraining influence upon those who otherwise might disregard public right and interest. It is specifically provided in section 2 of the bill that the Secretary of Commerce may refuse a license to any person or corporation which, in his judgment, is monopolizing radio communication. He is authorized with respect to licenses for stations transmitting to foreign countries to impose any terms, conditions, or restrictions which may be imposed with respect to cable landing licenses under the act of May 27, 1921. We have authorized the Secretary to revoke the license of any person or company which the Interstate Commerce Commission in the exercise of the authority conferred upon it finds has made any unjust and unreasonable charge or has made or prescribed any unjust and unreasonable regulation or practice with respect to the transmission of messages or service.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I wish to state that section 2 of the existing law also provides for cancellation when they violate any regulations of the Secretary of Commerce and the Secretary of Labor, and puts both licenses and control in their hands.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I am not arguing with the gentleman on what the present law provides. I can not see any pertinency in that remark whatever.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as a member of the subcommittee—

Mr. ABERNETHY. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. As a member of the subcommittee I have not had any time on this bill, and I would like to use my time, but I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I want the gentleman to explain one matter on page 11, which has bothered me somewhat. It is provided, in lines 10 and 11, that the Secretary of Commerce may suspend for transmitting superfluous signals or signals containing profane or obscene words or language.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Yes; transmitting signals containing obscene language—

Mr. ABERNETHY. I can understand about the profane or obscene language, but what does "superfluous signals" mean?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The attention of the committee was called to a situation in one of the large cities. The clergymen have a custom of broadcasting their sermons Sunday forenoons. A gentleman in that city is opposed to the transmission of these sermons by the church, and while he does not send out any profane or obscene language he clutters up the air with a lot of unintelligible, purely nonsensical sentences and speeches. He does that for the express purpose of interfering with the clergymen who are broadcasting their sermons.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say generally, with reference to this bill, that I find myself, contrary to my custom, in favor of a bill for the regulation of some matters relating to private business. In my opinion radio communication is the one subject perhaps above all others where it is not only proper but necessary that the Government shall regulate operations. The fathers of the Republic never foresaw any such conditions as exist to-day with reference to radio communication. True, they did not foresee the building of railroads or many other improvements which we have in our time, and still we find that in the Constitution they specifically gave Congress the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States, and to establish post offices and post roads.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Now, Mr. Chairman, since the fathers of the Republic provided for these things which existed in their day, and which cross State lines and which were necessarily of an interstate and national character, does anybody doubt that if the present situation of the world had existed with reference to radio communication there would have been a provision in the Constitution granting legislation on that subject? But we are not basing this legislation on any claim that does not come within the absolute provisions of the Constitution itself, for, as I tried to show in a little colloquy I had with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], we do limit it to radio communication which extends beyond the jurisdiction of the State, Territory, or the District of Columbia in which the same originates or where interference would be caused thereby with the transmission or reception of messages or signals from beyond the jurisdiction of said State, Territory, or the District of Columbia.

The main purpose of this legislation is to regulate interference in the air. The time has come when this art of radio communication has taken such a hold upon the fancies and imaginations of the people that everybody is anxious to indulge in the use of radio communication. Thousands upon thousands of people are sending messages through the air with no other purpose than to obtain the amusement that they get out of the practice and use of the art. Aside from this enjoyment they serve no useful purpose, but sometimes they do serve harmful purposes. For instance, the hearings before the committee showed that very frequently ships which are in distress at sea are unable to transmit messages or receive messages sent to them because of this interference in the air.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. For a brief question.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I want to support the gentleman's measure. But I understood the gentleman to say a moment ago that a lot of folks were sending matter through the air for amusement, and that they interfered with other things. Do I understand that the purpose in this bill is to stop those messages that are sent for amusement?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. No; I was coming to that. The purpose is not to stop the sending of messages for amusement, but the purpose is to regulate the sending, so that it can all be done in a way that every sender will not interfere with other senders or with those trying to receive messages. There will be a wave length set aside by the Secretary of Commerce for certain kinds of messages, and I think very probably certain hours will be set aside in which people sending certain kinds of messages will have the preference. For instance, I think market reports should have a time for radio communication during a part of the day. I think sermons broadcasted by churches and clergymen ought to have some consideration at the hands of the department. I think all these things should be done, and beyond all arrangements should be made so that messages sent from ship to ship and ship to shore and shore to ship would be uninterrupted.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. And without some regulation the whole matter would be chaos.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. It is chaotic to-day. The SOS signals coming from the ocean sometimes do not reach their destination because somebody interferes through a broadcasting station or a private station which is not broadcasting but is simply sending out personal messages. It is not the purpose of this legislation to interfere with the rights of anybody, but the purpose is to make it possible for everybody to enjoy the wonderful privilege of sending messages through the air.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Does not the gentleman think under the present law the Secretary of Commerce could regulate the very thing he is talking about?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. No; because under the present law the Secretary of Commerce has no discretion in issuing the license. If you should go into court, you could probably mandamus him to issue a license to operate, and he could not refuse to grant a license.

Mr. MADDEN. In other words, the Secretary of Commerce, in granting a license to-day, can not provide against the things prohibited in this bill.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The gentleman is correct. Mr. Chairman, this subject is very fascinating. I think all of us are interested in learning something about it. In last Sunday's issue of the New York Times I find an article upon the subject of radio which is very illuminating, and in the course of which a very surprising occurrence is related. For the first time a message was sent without interruption from a radio station in Japan and received on the Atlantic seaboard in less than a fraction of a second. In order to accomplish this feat it was necessary to ask the powerful station in France to refrain from using the air at that particular moment. It was also necessary that a number of other stations refrain from using the air. I shall not take the time to read this report; but I shall ask leave to insert it in my remarks in the RECORD, and also I shall ask unanimous consent to insert a column from the same article on the subject of how ether waves operate in the transmission of radio communications.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request to so extend his remarks in the RECORD?

There was no objection.

The articles referred to are as follows:

[From New York Times, January 21, 1923.]

RADIO FROM JAPAN.

The New York Times radio station has copied a 22-word message direct from station JAA, near Tokyo, thought to be the first time a complete message from Japan has been recorded in New York. It is difficult to tune in the Japanese station from the eastern coast of the United States, because of interference created by the powerful French station, UFT, on the outskirts of Paris, operating on practically the same wave length, 14,600 meters. One morning last week, at 2.07 o'clock, the French transmitter was standing by, as were stations on the Atlantic coast of this country, giving the Japanese dots and dashes opportunity to register in New York with great clearness.

Ordinarily it requires several hours to get a message from Tokyo to New York, for it must be sent to Honolulu, then relayed to San Francisco, where it is put on the land telegraph lines and sent across the continent. It takes at least three weeks for a letter to travel from Japan to New York. Radio spans the 9,000 miles across the Pacific and the United States in a fraction of a second.

RADIO—HOW ETHER WAVE OPERATES.

All types of waves, including heat, light, water, sound, and radio, are produced in a medium which will vibrate or oscillate when disturbed. Waves are vibratory motion. When a stone is cast into a body of water the surface of the water is disturbed and waves are set in motion. When the vocal chords of a speaker vibrate, the air is disturbed and waves of sound are created. The ether, an invisible, odorless, tasteless substance, is the medium in which radio waves travel. These electro-magnetic waves can not be seen, neither can they be heard until transformed into sound at the receiving set.

Water waves explain the formation of the invisible radio waves. Picture a pond of smooth water as the ether of space. When a stone is thrown into the water it starts a series of ripples or waves, which spread in all directions. The waves continually increase, but at a speed sufficient to cover only a few inches a second. If there are any little pieces of wood floating within range of the waves they bob up and down as the waves strike them. These bits of floating material may be contrasted to the radio-receiving stations. Radio waves, as well as the waves of light, heat, and sound, travel in ever-increasing circles. Incidentally, that is why the seats in a theater are generally arranged in a semicircle. The heat from a fire radiates in all directions from the source. The further one moves from the fire the less intense the heat. The waves of heat, light, sound, water, and radio all become weaker with distance.

To produce radio waves it is necessary to have an electrical circuit carrying a vibrating, or, to use the electrical term, an alternating current, which sets the waves in motion. The condenser, two or more sheets of metal separated by an insulating material called the dielectric, serves as the basis of radio transmission. One of the metallic plates acquires a positive charge of electricity and the other plate a negative charge. They are connected through a conducting wire and a discharge takes place, giving rise to radio-frequency currents or waves.

The antenna and ground form an enormous condenser. The antenna wire acts as one metallic plate, the ground as the other plate, with the air between serving as the insulating material or dielectric. In connection with the transmitting apparatus this condenser receives an electric charge which it then discharges, setting the ether in vibration, similar to the effect created by a stone dropped in a pond of water.

The microphone in a radio studio picks up music and sends it over the line to the apparatus room, where voice amplifier tubes give it increased strength; modulator tubes vary the current in accordance with the sound vibrations, and power tubes give it the impetus which sends radio frequency currents into the antenna system. The waves spread out from the antenna in all directions, increasing in diameter similar to water waves, but at the speed of light, 186,000 miles a second, equivalent to encircling the earth seven and one-half times in the tick of a watch.

WAVE LENGTH.

The waves maintain a certain distance between each other. The distance from the crest of one wave to the crest of the wave ahead or preceding is called a wave length. If the distance from crest to crest is 360 meters, then the station is said to operate or broadcast on a wave length of 360 meters. A meter is equal to 39.37 inches. High-powered trans-Atlantic stations transmit on a wave length several miles long, and one has a wave measuring 14 miles from crest to crest.

Wave lengths are measured by an instrument called a wave meter. Suppose you were in a boat anchored in a pond and that you counted the waves which passed and noted by a watch how many crests passed in a second. If five crests passed in a second it could be said that the frequency of the waves was five a second. After the speed of the waves is known the distance from crest to crest can be calculated. If the speed is 10 feet a second, and 5 pass in a second, the length of the waves is 10 divided by 5, or 2 feet. The speed of radio waves is 300,000,000 meters a second. If the frequency with which the waves strike the antenna is known, the distance from crest to crest can be calculated.

The larger the stone and stronger the force which hurls it into a pond the greater will be the wave length. In radio wave length has nothing to do with the power of the transmitter. The more amperes in the aerial circuit and the greater the pressure in volts between the aerial and ground, the more powerful will be the radio waves and the longer the distance covered.

When the Hertzian wave strikes an antenna in tune with its particular wave length a current similar to the transmitter current, but of decreased intensity, is induced in the wire. The tuning instruments of the receiving set place the station in tune with the incoming waves. That is, by varying the amount of wire on the coils and the capacity of the condensers the wave length of the receiver is made the same as that of the broadcasting station. The stations are then said to be in resonance, or in tune. The human ear can not hear all frequencies—sounds which vibrate above and below the range of the ear. Frequencies below 10,000 cycles are known as audio frequencies because they are normally audible to the ear. All frequencies above 10,000 cycles are termed radio frequencies. It is the detector which converts the incoming high frequency wave to a frequency low enough to actuate the phones and produce sound audible to the human ear.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, the subcommittee of which the gentleman from Maine [Mr. WHITE] is chairman spent very much time on this legislation. Prior to the consideration of the matter by the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries and its subcommittee on radio, the whole subject had been considered, as is well known, in a conference which was called by the Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Hoover. You will find the record of that conference in the hearings, or a résumé of the proceedings of that conference, beginning at page 32, and it will be interesting for the members to read that summary of the work and conclusions of the conference. This conference had attending it representatives of all the Government departments, of all of the people who are interested in this subject matter, the manufacturers of apparatus, and the amateur receivers and transmitters. All the people who might have an interest of any sort in the matter of radio communication were represented at this conference, and they joined unanimously in requesting legislation of the character which has now been placed before us in this bill. As we go along reading the various sections members of the committee no doubt may find it necessary to ask questions and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. WHITE], if no one else, will be able to answer them fully. I shall not take any more time now to discuss in detail the legislation, but I want to emphasize that the main purpose of the legislation is to stop the interference in the air which is preventing messages from being sent and from being received by all who are interested in radio communication.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that his time be extended for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Can there be a transmitting station in operation after the bill passes unless it has a license?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. There can not.

Mr. FESS. And the license will stipulate certain conditions, and if they are not obeyed, what then?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The license will be revoked.

Mr. FESS. That will make it effective?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Yes. I want to emphasize again that this bill has nothing whatever to do with receiving stations.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Yes.

Mr. EVANS. Under the terms of the proposed legislation, a license granted to an individual is a personal privilege?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Yes.

Mr. EVANS. And with his death it expires?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Yes.

Mr. EVANS. A license to a corporation will run the full 10 years unless revoked for cause.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. It can not be assigned.

Mr. EVANS. Is not that for the purpose of forcing licenses to corporations rather than to individuals?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. No.

Mr. EVANS. And will it not have that effect?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I do not think so. It will be only exceptional that licensees will die. We can not provide for that kind of a situation in a bill of this sort. Licenses are always personal; they do not pass to the estate of the deceased. The personal representative does not step into the shoes of a deceased licensee in any kind of licensing legislation that I know of.

Mr. EVANS. May I challenge the gentleman's attention further to the fact that you must not only have a license to conduct a station but you must have a license for the operator, and, therefore, if a license to conduct a station costing perhaps a million dollars should expire by death, there is a great amount of money there that would be unprofitable unless another license could be gotten for the conduct of the station. Therefore, any person contemplating the construction of a station would naturally do it under a corporate right.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I would say to the gentleman that any individual who originally obtained a license from the Secretary of Commerce would have no difficulty in having it renewed. But, as I understand the gentleman, he is now referring to a case where a licensee dies?

Mr. EVANS. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. If a station had been properly conducted by an individual who dies, I can not conceive that the Secretary of Commerce would refuse to grant a license to his heirs or legatees.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has again expired.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask that his time be extended for five minutes. I want to ask him a question or two.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. We are all endeavoring to learn, and we appreciate the attention that the gentleman has given to the subject. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] put a query in our minds in respect to interference within the States with those who may see fit to use these machines. Will the Government control such communications as pass within the boundaries of a State?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. No; this bill does not cover that.

Mr. BUTLER. That is the gentleman's conclusion on that?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. That is the language of the bill.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand that certain machines are made capable of sending these messages a certain distance. There is what you call the long-distance machine and the short-distance machine. The distance that a message may be sent may be regulated by these authorities upon whom we confer this power. Is not that true? So that, therefore, within a State they may hold that a man can send 10 or 15 or 20 miles, and if he does not send across the boundary there will be no control.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. If he does not cross the boundary, the Secretary of Commerce will have no control.

Mr. MADDEN. The bill specifically provides that he shall not have.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman is not exactly accurate in his statement about the bill controlling only transmitting machines. In so far as the receiving machines may interfere with transmission, and the evidence shows they could do so very materially, this control would also regulate the receiving machines, and to that extent the gentleman is inaccurate in his statement.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Right on that point there was evidence to the effect that sometimes a receiving set would give out signals that would interfere, and while that was recognized this bill does not undertake to control or regulate those machines in the least. It might reach a point where that could be done, and it was the opinion of the experts that the machines would be so perfected that that could be done.

Mr. BUTLER. But the committee took it up for consideration, and shall regulate it hereafter.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. There is nothing in this bill providing in the least for regulation of any receiving set whatever.

Mr. BARBOUR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I will.

Mr. BARBOUR. In line with the question asked by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER], can the gentleman state whether it is possible to so regulate it that none of these messages being broadcasted will go a certain distance and there stop and not go farther?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I will say to the gentleman that the hearings brought out the fact that improvements are now being made under which it is expected, and I think the result is now being accomplished, to confine a message from the front end of a train to the rear end of the train. If that can be done, I apprehend it will be possible to restrict and limit the operation of other transmitting machines.

I will say this, however, that it is a very difficult matter to control a message when you send it out through the ether by radiocommunication. You may not be able to tell just where it would stop, and, of course, those are accidents against which you can not always guard, and no legislation could be so perfect as to meet a situation of that kind.

Mr. BARBOUR. As a practical matter at this time it is almost impossible to distinguish between intrastate and interstate transmission?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I will say to the gentleman frankly that in my opinion nearly all the transmitting stations in the United States will come under the regulations of this bill.

Mr. BARBOUR. That is my idea.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Necessarily.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I will.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I want to pursue the question I asked this morning just a little bit further. Now, the bill says—

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Where is the gentleman reading?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I am reading page 5, beginning with line 15—

Such station license, the wave length or lengths authorized to be used by the licensee, and the rights therein granted shall not be transferred, assigned, or in any manner, either voluntarily or involuntarily, disposed of to any other person, company, or corporation without the consent in writing of the Secretary of Commerce.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I said there could not be any assignment.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Now, it has been a quite common practice for people having sending stations to take their apparatus to some other place where there is an important speech or concert going on and use it there for the purpose of broadcasting that particular speech or concert. Now, my question was whether that could be done under this bill, and the then speaker intimated that it might not be possible. I think it would be left under the regulations of the Secretary of Commerce.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I think it is within the discretion of the Secretary of Commerce.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, everybody who has studied this subject and who is acquainted with the existing conditions knows that additional legislation on this subject is necessary in order to avoid the conflicts and interferences and chaos which have arisen in the transmission of radio by reason of a lack of proper regulation or control over the subject. Now the gentleman from Texas is insisting that the present law is sufficient. If he had studied this subject as much as some of us have undertaken to do, and had studied the existing statute and the proposed bill in the light of conditions that exist, I know he would not subscribe to that opinion. The present law was enacted 10 years ago, since which time there has been an absolutely marvelous growth in this art, not only in the art from a scientific standpoint but in the actual application of the art to the different phases of our official, commercial, and social life. It is as necessary to take some steps to allocate wave lengths and time and to otherwise regulate the problem properly, in order to avoid these conflicts, as is the necessity of preserving this art and its practical utilization, because it can not be done without proper regulation.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. My time is so limited.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I am with the gentleman, but I want to get this clear in the RECORD. Do I understand the gentleman's position to be that there is nothing in this legislation that will in any wise interfere with the man who transmits who does it within certain rules and regulations set forth in this bill and pays his license?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. No; if he does not violate the law or regulations.

Mr. ABERNETHY. It does not give the Secretary of Commerce the right to say that you shall or shall not if he stays within the rules and regulations in speaking through the air. Is that right?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Well, I do not know whether that could be answered unequivocally. There might be one man operating a transmitting station at a certain point who uses a certain assigned wave length, and his competitor might ask for the privilege of operating a station from the same point with the same wave length, and, of course, the Secretary of Commerce would properly refuse to grant it. In other words, the Secretary of Commerce is necessarily given some discretionary powers as to certain phases of the question which are not expressly enumerated in the bill.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. BUTLER. I understood the gentleman to say in his opinion unless there is some regulation of this kind this art will go into disuse, which otherwise would be of benefit to all of us.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I think so. Some of you have had an experience in talking over a party telephone line, with two or three or four other people trying to talk over it at the same time. [Laughter.] That is largely the situation here, except that here it is greatly augmented by the conditions. When you take into consideration the fact that there are now over 21,000 transmission stations and 569 broadcasting stations, and every fellow practically transmitting when he pleases and how he pleases, you can get some conception of the situation that has already arisen, and which will become greater every day, because the number of these stations is rapidly increasing and the business of using these stations is growing by leaps and bounds all the time.

Now, with regard to the existing law and this proposed bill, I want to say this: I believe that any Member of this House who will acquaint himself with the conditions and will study the existing law and this pending bill is bound to concede that the proposed law more nearly protects and preserves the Government's interests and the general public interest than the existing law, instead of being the contrary, as was argued for an hour here. It is true with me and with other members of the committee and of the subcommittee who have studied this subject that we are as much opposed to the unnecessary centralization of Government power and unnecessary bureaus and unnecessary Government officials as anybody in this House, including any of those who have spoken against this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman may have 10 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request that the gentleman from Tennessee have 10 minutes additional?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I do not agree with my colleague from Texas [Mr. JONES] that no regulation is necessary. I am for the general purposes of the bill. There are just two objections that I have to it, and I have stated them. With State rights protected and the expense of machinery out, I am just as strongly for the bill as is the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Yes. I was referring principally to the gentleman's colleague [Mr. JONES].

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I do not want the gentleman to misrepresent my position. I am not opposed to regulation. I am in favor of regulation as far as it can be done.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Even the gentleman from Texas and everybody else must concede that the power of regulation must rest in somebody. Now, the proposed bill does not change the regulatory power. It leaves it right where it has been all the time, in the Secretary of Commerce. But it simply amplifies and imposes additional restrictions and additional safeguards for the protection of the public interest and of the Government interest and the rights of everybody who is interested in this service.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HUSTED. I think the gentleman said that the committee were not anxious to centralize this power any more than was necessary?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Absolutely.

Mr. HUSTED. And yet as a matter of fact the committee have, as I see it, vested in the Secretary of Commerce absolute, uncontrolled, and unrestricted authority to handle the entire situation. Now, I assume you did that because you did not see any other way in which desirable results could be accomplished, and I would be thankful if the gentleman would explain why it has not been possible in some way to limit this authority of the Secretary of Commerce and yet give him enough authority to control those things that should be controlled.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Well, that is just what the committee has undertaken to do. While it does confer certain powers upon the Secretary, certain discretionary powers, yet here is an 18-page bill which undertakes to define the powers he shall have and the manner in which he shall exercise those powers; but the committee does say that it is absolutely necessary to leave some matters of discretion to the Secretary of Commerce or somebody else, and that is especially true in view of the fact that this art is developing at such a rapid pace and conditions are changing so quickly that it is impossible, at least at this stage of the art, to absolutely make a strait-jacket set of regulations in regard to the subject.

Mr. HUSTED. Do you not give the Secretary of Commerce absolute authority to grant licenses, and absolute authority to revoke licenses to any person or from any person that he sees fit?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. In connection with certain restrictions recited in the bill, that is so.

Mr. HUSTED. I mean he can take a license away from anybody. Either the gentleman or some other gentleman who has spoken on the bill has said that there was not any intention to interfere with these broadcasting stations. And yet you do give the Secretary of Commerce absolute authority to do it, do you not?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. He is authorized to revoke licenses for certain specified reasons, and of course he might abuse his authority just as any other official might do it; but he would have to violate the spirit and letter of this law to do anybody an injustice in regard to it. As to whether or not he will do that, that is simply a question of confidence that Congress has got to impose in him or some other official.

Mr. HUSTED. Would he have to violate the letter of the law in order to do it? I realize he would have to violate the spirit of it, because it is not the intention; but he would not have to violate the letter of the law in order to do it, would he?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Well, possibly, he might not upon a matter purely within his discretion. In other words, this law does not undertake to say he shall issue a license to or withhold it from Tom, Dick, and Harry, and all that. It does not do that. It leaves some discretion, and within the extent of the discretion lodged, of course, he can do it, and he might exercise that discretionary power unwisely.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Would it not be a good ground for impeachment if he willfully violated the law?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Of course.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to deal with one or two other phases of this question, if I may be permitted to do so without being interrupted. Hitherto, most of my time has been taken up in answering questions.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I will yield later if I have the time. I will be glad to.

Mr. ABERNETHY. All right.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] had a great deal to say about the fact that the report concedes that there will probably be in the near future a necessity for additional legislation in order to prevent any monopoly, and while that is not in the report, I will add perhaps in regard to the regulation of rates, because I think there is no question but that the time will come when it will be just as important and just as proper to fully regulate this service with regard to rates and all the other functions they perform as it is to regulate the railroads and the telegraphs and the telephones. Now, that is true, and the committee readily concedes it in their report, and it readily concedes that it does not undertake in a comprehensive way to deal with that particular phase of this subject in this bill, although the report does recite three specific instances in which provisions are inserted to prevent monopoly and excessive rates. Because the committee said that the state of the art is such, and the limited investigation of that particular phase of the subject is such, that the committee did not see proper to embody a comprehensive measure on that phase of it now, the gentleman from Texas claims that we admit that we do not know anything about the phases of the subject with which the bill does deal. I want to say that the committee has thoroughly considered and discussed every phase of the subject that the bill deals with, and we think we know something about it, perhaps almost as much as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] knows. And in so far as we deal with it we think we deal with it intelligently and properly.

But so far as that one particular phase is concerned, there is another reason, as stated in the report, why the committee knew it was not worth while to report provisions on that subject designed to regulate rates and prevent monopolies and things of that kind. That is that there would doubtless be strenuous opposition to that proposition, perhaps so much opposition from the interests affected that it probably would have prevented the passage of any bill during this session. The pending measure, while well matured and well considered, is an emergency measure. It meets a situation about which there is no controversy among those informed, and it undertakes to deal with that situation in a manner about which there is no controversy among those who have studied the question and know what they are talking about, and that is the reason why every member of the committee who has studied the subject is in favor of this bill and voted for the reporting of it. [Applause.]

I dare say that at a later time the committee will take up the study of the other questions mentioned and will undertake to deal with it as the Congress has dealt with the subject of railroad transportation, the telegraph, and the telephone, in a comprehensive manner.

With regard to what was suggested by my other colleague from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] awhile ago, I believe attention has already been called to the fact that this bill does not even undertake to deal with anything except interstate radio service—in other words, where the message goes from one State to another or from this country to foreign countries. That is true. It does not undertake to deal with the subject of radio which is confined to a State. We could not do that if we wanted to; but we are not wanting to and not undertaking to do it. So that this bill involves no invasion of State rights. We have just as much legal and constitutional and moral right to deal with this subject in so far as it is interstate or international as we had to deal with railroad transportation or the telegraph or the telephone; and I dare say that while this art is in its infancy and legislation upon the subject, you might say, is in its incipient stage, yet this bill probably deals with it as comprehensively and intelligently as the first legislation that was enacted upon the subject of railroad transportation. As evils may arise, as subterfuges may be resorted to, as abuses may be practiced, it will become necessary to enact legislation to meet those new contingencies. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON: Mr. Chairman, I offer a perfecting amendment.

The CHAIRMAN: Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLANTON: Page 2, line 9, after the word "authorized," strike out the period, insert a colon, and add the following proviso, to wit: "Provided, That where intrastate operation is so controlled and regulated by States in cooperation with the Secretary of Commerce that same does not conflict or interfere with interstate operations, then such intrastate operations shall remain wholly within the jurisdiction and control of such State."

Mr. HICKS: I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN: The point of order is reserved.

Mr. BLANTON: Mr. Chairman, all this amendment does is to clarify the bill and make it do just what the committee said the bill would do. It provides that where intrastate operation is so conducted by the State that it does not conflict or interfere with interstate operation, the State cooperating with the Secretary of Commerce to that end, then that the State shall retain jurisdiction over its intrastate operations. That is now and ought to be the law. No man who believes in the sovereignty of our States could object to that fundamental proposition.

Mr. WILLIAMSON: Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON: In just one minute. Gentlemen will state that no one is afraid of what the Secretary of Commerce might do in the way of interfering with the proper business of the local States. Let me call your attention to what happened after the war respecting certain legitimate business in Texas that was controlled and manipulated by a Cabinet officer from the State of Texas. You remember that after the war was over, after the armistice was signed, in peace time, Postmaster General Burleson, who hails from my native State, took over the telephone lines. He was from Texas. He had been an official in the State of Texas. He was presumed to be close to the people of Texas. Yet he so regulated and controlled the local telephone lines, the intrastate lines, of Texas that he almost broke every little independent telephone line in that State.

Mr. MADDEN: He increased the rates of the telephone companies. How could he break them by doing that?

Mr. BLANTON: He did it in such a way that the big companies lived and the little independent companies that served the rural population had to go out of business. That was his regulation and control from Washington.

Mr. BUTLER: Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON: I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BUTLER: Suppose Congress passes a law authorizing the Secretary of Commerce to regulate the transmission of these messages within the State. Such a law will be no good. We have no authority to pass such a law as that. Is not that true?

Mr. BLANTON: But we are gradually encroaching upon the rights of the States all the time and centralizing power in the hands of one man in this Federal Capital.

Mr. BUTLER: If we should pass such a law, attempting to interfere with intrastate affairs, it would not be a good law, would it?

Mr. BLANTON: It would be good until the Supreme Court passed on it and set it aside, and sometimes there are four members of that court divided one way and five another, and sometimes you can not tell what their decision is going to be. We want to be watchful of the rights of the States with regard both to transportation and telegraph and telephone and radio service, which are the means of proper communication between the people of the country. We have in my State an agricultural experiment station. It serves the farmers of Texas. It does not serve the farmers of Arkansas or the farmers of Pennsylvania. It serves Texas farmers. Suppose it has certain rules and regulations concerning radio that will benefit the farmers of my great State. Before it can continue to exercise the sovereignty and prerogative of a State to serve its farmers it has got to sneak up here to Washington and get a license from the Secretary of Commerce, although it should properly control and operate its own business. It might not interfere in any manner whatever with the business of the Nation. Yet it has got to come here and get a license first. And when he gets a license he has to have the Secretary of Commerce pass on his application. He, an official of Texas, has to stand here, the representative of a State, as a menial before the Secretary of Commerce and plead for something that he should have as a matter of right fundamentally. I am not in favor of it. [Applause.]

Mr. DICKINSON: Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment; and I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed, out of order, for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN: The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to proceed, out of order, for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas: Reserving the right to object, upon what subject?

Mr. DICKINSON: It is on editorials that have appeared in the newspapers and with reference to some remarks by the Secretary of the Navy—

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas: Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my reservation of an objection.

The CHAIRMAN: Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

Mr. DICKINSON: Mr. Chairman, an amendment offered to the Army bill on the floor of the House under date of January 17, 1923, bearing upon the right of retired and active officers of the Army to become employed by persons or corporations selling either service or material to the Government, has attracted the attention not only of the Secretary of War but also some of the leading daily newspapers of the country. I refer to the statement of Secretary of War Weeks, issued and published in last Sunday's Washington Star on January 21, 1923, and also to an editorial appearing in the New York Times under date of January 22, 1923, bearing upon this subject.

The underlying principle involved in this legislation is as old as the Book of Books, and was advocated by the Master of Men when He proclaimed "That no man can serve two masters." [Applause.] It is the old rule of agency; that any person attempting to represent two interests that conflict, at the same time, does not faithfully serve either. I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that practically every State in the Union has long since passed laws controlling the Commonwealth and the municipalities of their respective States to the effect that no man holding public office can become a vendor of either service or material to such Commonwealth or municipality. This prohibition is imposed upon the State and municipality alike. Why strew the pathway of the Army officers or the Navy officers with temptation?

Under date of June 10, 1896, a permanent law was passed affecting officers of the Navy and Marine Corps, as follows:

And provided further, That hereafter no payment shall be made from appropriations made by Congress to any officer in the Navy or Marine Corps on the active or retired list while such officer is employed after June 30, 1897, by any person or company furnishing naval supplies or war material to the Government; and such employment is hereby made unlawful after this date.

I note with regret that the Naval Affairs Committee of the House has favorably reported House bill 11002, with Report No. 835, providing—that all laws or parts of laws prohibiting officers on the retired list of the Navy from accepting employment with concerns furnishing supplies to the Government * * * are hereby repealed.

So far as I am able to learn, no hearings were held upon this phase of the bill, and I regret that such provision has been placed in the bill, and am pleased to note that in the hearings before the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs on House bill 7864, the committee has authorized the report of the bill, but has not authorized such repeal. In the hearings before the Senate Naval Committee on House bill 7864, found on page 10 thereof, I quote the following:

Assistant Secretary ROOSEVELT. Section 10. The Secretary did not speak about this, but I know he has it very closely to his heart. It is a question of amending the act as to the occupations that may be engaged in by officers, omitting from the act the words "retired officer" in order that a retired officer may engage in such activities as shipbuilding, and things of that nature. As it stands now the retired officer is prohibited from engaging in any occupation which may touch upon the Navy's activities. I know the Secretary feels very strongly that this cramps an officer's usefulness to the community and is unfair to such officers.

The theory that prompted it, I suppose, was that it might create an embarrassing situation and accusations of undue influence. But I can not myself see how that would occur, and it seems to me to be unfair to prohibit a retired naval officer to so engage in the only activities for which his training has fitted him.

The CHAIRMAN. I notice it has come up recently in a certain case of some prominence in the Army, just a few days ago, and attracted considerable attention in the newspapers.

But suppose a case of this kind, and I think this would present the basis upon which the legislation was originally passed, a retired officer, say an admiral of great influence among his associates in the Navy, is drawing retired pay from the Government, and he takes employment at a high salary with some manufacturing concern supplying an enormous quantity of material to the Government. He represents that concern in selling this material to the department which he just left and of which he is still a part.

I would like to get your opinion about it.

Secretary DENBY. That is, of course, the worst argument that can be made against it.

The CHAIRMAN. I think that was the situation that Congress probably had in mind.

Secretary DENBY. That is an extreme illustration of the possibility. But, on the other hand, it applies to men that are perfectly active, still on the retired list, men who I believe would be almost universally thoughtful of the service and the good interests of the service, but who are barred from almost all the activities in which they can engage. We ask men who have been 45 or 50 years, perhaps, in the naval service to remain on half pay of $4,000, say, for the rest of their lives, not permitted to take employment outside.

Personally I would like to see former naval officers accept employment with such concerns, because I believe it would tend to protect the Navy. They do not lose their interest in the Navy when they leave it, and in matters of shipbuilding, and things of that kind, I think the Navy would be most highly benefited if we could get retired officers in shipbuilding companies.

I happened to meet a man the other day who resigned from the Navy, and he told me that the first suggestion he made to persons offering him employment was, "Now, remember, if you employ me I think first of the Navy."

He certainly would not hurt the people of the United States or the naval service when he took employment with a private concern with that thought in mind; that his duty still lay in the protection of the naval service. It is not fair to the men themselves. They ought to be allowed to get such employment. They should, of course, be treated exactly as other malefactors are treated if they attempt to "put over" anything they should not.

The CHAIRMAN. I did not say what I said in order to indicate any opinion on it at all, but I just suggest that there is not anything in the law that prohibits a retired naval officer from accepting employment, generally speaking, with private concerns. It is only those dealing with the naval service.

Secretary DENBY. The law is so broad that they can not deal with the Government.

I would like simply to register a very, very strong recommendation that that section be passed by the committee. I am told that the Army has no such restriction. I do not know that, and I do not think it has any particular bearing. But the Navy is very anxious to free its officers from their restrictions under which they are now suffering.

The retiring provisions of the Army and the Navy acts should be such as to encourage men to stay in both branches as long as they are useful to such organization, and the employment in outside enterprises by such retired officers should be discouraged, and particularly when such officers desire to enter into an activity wherein they are going to become instrumental in selling supplies to the Government, for either Army or Navy purposes. I am glad that such repeal provision will not be presented to the Senate in House bill 7864, and I hope that if House bill 11002 is presented to the House, that a sufficient number of Members will vote against the same to strike out the provision heretofore referred to.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKINSON. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER. If the gentleman will examine the hearings before the Naval Committee during the last four years, he will see that the Naval Committee has twice turned down an effort to repeal the law to which the gentleman refers, showing that this matter has been actively before the committee within the last few years.

Mr. DICKINSON. I thank the gentleman for that statement.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKINSON. Yes.

Mr. FESS. My exception to the amendment was that it was particular, and it seemed to me to be somewhat of a reflection upon the gentleman to whom it applied. I would be very quick to vote for a general law forbidding this to all retired officers, either of the Navy or the Army, but I thought particularizing was rather unfortunate.

Mr. DICKINSON. As a matter of fact, I would say in reply to the gentleman that this will not affect only General Harbord, it will affect other retired officers of the Army who are similarly employed.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKINSON. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. The gentleman from Ohio has just stated that he did not believe in making exceptions in the case of officers. I think the gentleman from Ohio is one of those who voted for the statute whereby General Harbord was made an exception and permitted to serve two terms in Washington of four years each, as against the general law which requires them to serve four years and then go out in the field.

Mr. DICKINSON. I shall refer to that a little later.

I call your attention to the fact that if this policy is carried out we would soon have retired naval officers controlling the organizations that provide the material for the building of our ships while receiving their retired pay from the Government; we would have a circle within a circle; corporations and concerns manned by officers of our Government promoting legislation for their own interests and selling their material to their respective departments, regardless of the interests of the public in general. I hope the friends of this provision will not plead the loyalty of these men as a defense to such a system, because Army and Navy officers alike are just human beings and are subject to all the frailties of human life and are subconsciously controlled by personal interests.

Now, referring more directly to the amendment offered to the Army bill, with reference to such retired pay, will say that my only regret is that the amendment as passed is not permanent law. It was not my intention to strike at the officers retiring during the present year, but my intention was to declare a policy that Congress expects to put in vogue in future, the same provision with reference to the retired pay in the Army as heretofore enacted with reference to the Navy. If I had thought the amendment could have passed including the word "hereafter," the same would certainly have been inserted.

General Harbord was born March 21, 1866; he enlisted January 10, 1889, and served as an enlisted man until August 1, 1891, was appointed a second lieutenant July 31, 1891, and gradually advanced to his commanding position of major general, and served with distinction overseas during the late World War, having served approximately 34 years and retired at the age of 56 years.

Permit me to state here that on August 28, 1922, this Congress, in H. R. 11689, passed a special bill permitting General Harbord, as Deputy Chief of Staff, to be appointed Chief of Staff, presuming that General Pershing was about to retire. This bill was passed at the suggestion of the Secretary of War. He knew at that time that General Harbord had been stationed in Washington for about three and one-half years and that the Mauch law requiring that every officer must serve with troops every other four years of his service would require General Harbord to again be given field service. In view of this fact the Secretary of War asked that this special bill be passed in behalf of General Harbord, and considered him sufficiently efficient to be appointed as Chief of Staff.

In the month of December, 1922, and about December 29, the Secretary of War, however, gave his approval for the retirement of General Harbord, even though his efficiency is not curtailed, his health is good, and no argument can be presented for his retirement except his desire to take up a more lucrative field of employment. Permit me to read from the hearings before the subcommittee of the House Appropriations Committee considering the Army appropriation bill, on page 802 thereof:

I do want to say that the department and the Army have suffered a very serious loss in the retirement of General Harbord. The conditions were such that I could not refuse to approve his application to go on the retired list.

It has long been the policy of the War Department not to retire Army officers after 30 years' service unless they have become inefficient or are in ill health and barring the readjustment that had to be made when the Army was reorganized under the reorganization act, this policy should be the policy of the War Department in the future. Under all these conditions, I am thoroughly convinced that the Secretary of War was not justified in permitting the retirement of General Harbord as suggested.

As a further reason for the adoption of the amendment heretofore referred to I want to state that, in my judgment, numerous Army officers are now holding lucrative positions with corporations and concerns manufacturing materials to be sold to the War Department, and that the practice in behalf of the Army can not be justified any more than it can for the Navy, and that this amendment not only should be retained in this appropriation bill, but should be later enacted into permanent law.

With reference to the connection of General Harbord with the Radio Corporation of America, in the statement of Secretary Weeks we find as follows:

As a matter of fact, the Government's business with the Radio Corporation is inconsequential. At the present time we have no contract with it, and, generally speaking, purchases of radio equipment, which are of small moment in total amount, are made from the manufacturers.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DICKINSON. In this connection I want to call your attention to the fact that the radio equipment of both the Army and the Navy, built up during the war, by reason of recent improvements and inventions is now practically obsolete; that in the near future all of this equipment must be replaced with the new and up-to-date equipment at large expense; that, in my judgment, within the next few years this Government will be spending millions of dollars for radio equipment, and will be invited to purchase the same through the Radio Corporation of America if its present plans are carried out; and I contend, in view of these facts, that in the first place General Harbord should not have retired, because he is rendering the most efficient service of any time during his career; that the Secretary of War should not have approved his application to retire; and that this legislation should be passed as a warning to officers in the Army that it will not be the policy of our Government to foster them for years as junior officers and then when they acquire the highest efficiency that they shall seek retirement and go on retired pay in order to become connected with some corporation that can pay them lucrative salaries. It should be the determination of every officer to remain in the service as long as his age and his health will permit him to render service to the Government. Any other policy is derogatory to an efficient Army or an efficient Navy. General Harbord is 56 years of age, has at least eight years of time that he should give to this Government rather than to the service of the Radio Corporation of America, while at the same time receiving 75 per cent of his pay as an Army officer.

From the New York Times editorial referred to, I quote the following:

The achievements for which the country can never be sufficiently grateful to General Harbord was his organization of the supply department, which made it possible for the Army from the base to the firing line to operate like a well-oiled machine. It was because General Harbord had done this intricate and difficult work so well that his energies were coveted in civil life, not because of his associations with the Army and Navy people.

If General Harbord through his efficiency has secured perfect service in the work referred to, and if he is still in perfect health, tell me why it is not his duty to continue to serve this Government that has so long fostered him and developed him to the man that he is now reported to be? In my judgment, under these conditions, if General Harbord desires to leave the service of the Army, he should resign, not retire on 75 per cent pay, in order to enter upon this service.

The same New York Times editorial further refers to the fact:

In its dragnet it would draw in almost all retired officers engaged in business. Their legitimate interests are at stake if such a law should be enforced literally.

If the retired officers of the Army are now engaged in the enterprise of manufacturing material for the sole purpose of making sales thereof to the Government, then there is all the more reason why this law should not only be passed but that an investigation should be made as to how far retired Army officers are interested in such enterprises, and a report made to Congress with reference thereto. It is my purpose to ask the Secretary of War, either through the introduction of a resolution in this House or through some other channel, to furnish to this House a statement of the list of retired officers engaged in such enterprises and connected with concerns selling materials to the War and Navy Departments.

This prohibition has stood against the naval officers since June 10, 1896; if during that time retired Army officers have so engaged themselves, it might give some light on the subject as to how it happened that the purchasing departments of the Army during the late World War made more serious blunders, more frivolous contracts, more unreasonable purchases, and squandered millions and millions of dollars furnished by the American people in an effort to supply an army of men with the necessities of life. So far as I know, the investigating committee of the Sixty-sixth Congress did not go into this phase of the matter in their investigation of war contracts. It seems that if a future war should come, and all of these Army officers now on the retired list so engaged in the manufacture of material were recalled to active service, that the people of this Government would lose faith in this department if it became known that numerous officers were called upon to make contracts with concerns with whom they had been previously connected in order that an army might be supplied with the necessities of life to enter upon active work in the field of battle.

I have the greatest respect for every Cabinet member and for every editorial written in the great city of New York; I regret that this record has been made by the Secretary of War; I regret that General Harbord has seen fit to cast this cloud upon his record, and also that the Secretary of War has disagreed with this Congress on numerous questions. It seems to me that this particular question is one upon which there can not be a divided view.

With respect to the views of the editorial writer of the New York Times I am not greatly concerned; I have often thought what a wonderful force for good morals and good government the editorial writers of the great dailies of New York City could be; but, on the other hand, I find that their moral conclusions on some of the vital issues of the day are dictated either by their appetites or by their interest in the results on the stock exchange; I find that with many of them this great country of ours is bounded on the west by the Hudson River, and that all they seem to see is the result of this Government as it applies to their particular locality, the city of New York. But in view of the fact that this matter does involve a governmental policy, which in my judgment is material not only for now but for the future, I have felt constrained to take the time of this House in order that this matter might be presented and the record completed, and with the verdict of this House and the American people I shall rest content; and it is my hope that the conferees will insist that the amendment shall remain in the bill. [Applause.]

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I desire to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. There is a point of order pending. Does the gentleman from New York press his point of order?

Mr. HICKS. I do. I make the point of order upon the ground that the amendment is not germane. The bill before us deals with interstate radio communications, amending a previous law, which also deals with interstate radio communications. This amendment touches intrastate communications, and, therefore, in my opinion, is not germane and is not in order.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I think it is merely a limitation confining the bill to interstate communications and not letting it go over or run into intrastate business. It is nothing in the world but a limitation.

The CHAIRMAN. The measure under consideration is all-pervading, so far as the regulation of radio communication is concerned. It is a general law, and in the first section covers radio communication among the several States or with foreign nations, radio communication upon any vessel of the United States engaged in interstate or foreign commerce, and also the transmission of radiograms or signals which extend beyond the jurisdiction of the State, Territory, or the District of Columbia. Under the last clause it is apparent that its purpose is to cover regulation of radiograms that extend beyond the jurisdiction of the State, Territory, or District of Columbia, radiograms that lapse over into a State from another State. This being a general law relating to the regulation of radiograms, it is within the power of the committee to restrict it in whatever way it seems fit. It is within the power of Members to offer amendments to restrict it to communications on foreign vessels. The committee may restrict control over activities exclusively interstate. The extent of the jurisdiction to be exercised is for the committee to pass upon, and the Chair holds the amendment is germane and overrules the point of order.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I want to say a word in opposition to the amendment. I heard the amendment read, and of course all the members of the committee who were present heard the amendment read. The definition given in the bill as it stands was prepared with a great deal of care after a very full consideration and scrutiny by the committee. I do not know that I can say at a moment's consideration of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas just what the effect of his amendment would be. I do not think the committee should adopt an amendment upon the spur of the moment which vitally affects the scope of the bill. As the bill stands now, as the definition stands now in the paragraph of this first section of the bill, it covers just exactly the legislation which was covered by the old law and contains exactly the language of the act of August 13, 1912, that has been construed by the courts and that has had a practical application given to it by the departments, that has had a long contemporaneous construction by the departments, and its meaning and its scope are well known and well understood. I therefore hope that we do not now hastily adopt an amendment to the definition.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, let us have the amendment read; there are some more Members who have come in.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

There was no objection.

The amendment was again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I speak as a member of the subcommittee which assisted in framing this legislation. I suppose there is a no more ardent advocate of State rights on the floor than I am. I am heartily in sympathy with the protection of the rights of the States.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Then what objection have you to this amendment, which takes care of State rights?

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. Because every benefit that is sought to be obtained by the amendment is amply given in the bill which is presented to the committee, and it is only for the purpose of calling the attention of the committee to the express language of the bill that I am going to take your time.

Now, take the first paragraph of the bill. It provides that—

No person, company, or corporation within the jurisdiction of the United States shall use or operate any apparatus for radio communication as a means of intercourse among the several States or with foreign nations, or upon any vessel of the United States engaged in interstate or foreign commerce, or for the transmission of radiograms or signals the effects of which extend—beyond the jurisdiction of the State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, in which the same originates, or where interference would be caused thereby with the transmission or reception of messages or signals from beyond the jurisdiction of said State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, except under and in accordance with a license in that behalf granted by the Secretary of Commerce and except as hereinafter authorized.

Where? I read:

So that by the express terms of the act the license which is provided for in the first paragraph of the act is limited to interstate and foreign business.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. I believe the language the gentleman has read, and which is contained in the first part of the section, would justify interference, we will say, with transmitting stations originally intended to operate within the State, but whose messages or signals would tend to interfere with interstate messages.

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. If the interference is with interstate business, then it is an interference under this bill.

Mr. LONDON. Then you could interfere with a transmitting station originally intended to operate within the limits of a State.

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. But if the transmitting station originally intended to operate within the State is interfering with interstate business, then it should be brought within the scope of regulation by Congress. It is exactly the same principle, as I see it, gentlemen, where there is an exercise of the right of navigation. Where there would be an interference with the commerce over which the Federal Government has control there would be a right on the part of the Federal Congress to govern that situation and regulate it. The necessity exists to regulate this business because of interference. The bill is confined to interstate messages and interferences with such messages. That is the purpose of this paragraph, as I understand it. [Applause.]

In the language of Mr. Hoover, the pending bill—fundamentally relates to regulation for the elimination, as far as may be, of interference, and the major field of interference to-day lies in the radiotelephone area, which concerns the low-meter wave length.

Mr. Hoover says in the hearings:

From the viewpoint of public interest the interference to-day largely lies in the broadcasting stations, broadcasting entertainments, news, and other matters of public interest. While there are altogether 569 of such stations, there are variously estimated from 1,500,000 to 2,000,000 receiving stations. So that the matter has become one of profound public interest.

The broadcasting of information and news, while it has largely entertainment and educational values, also furnishes the field of impulse in which the art must grow, and the amount of interference that arises from those 544 stations in absolute conflict is such that it threatens to undermine the useful purpose of the whole art.

There is a consensus of opinion that regulatory legislation in advance of that provided in the act of 1912 is necessary. This was the practically unanimous opinion of the witnesses appearing before the committee and it was the conclusion of the radio conference held in the city of Washington in 1922. The progress made in radio communication is evidenced by the increase in radio stations, for, as shown in the report, there were in July, 1922, but 17,421 transmitting stations, whereas on December 27, 1922, there were 21,065 transmitting stations.

Food for thought may be found also in the fact that of these 21,065 transmitting stations 16,898 were amateur stations, 2,762 were ship stations, 569 were broadcasting stations, 39 were coast stations, 12 were transoceanic stations, and some others not enumerated. It is shown in the report that the 17,421 stations in July, 1922, were using only 191 different wave lengths, and that of this total number of stations 279 were Government stations utilizing 122 of the total available wave lengths, leaving but 69 wave lengths for more than 17,000 private stations of all classes.

The principal purpose of this bill is to give greater powers of regulation and control, to the end that greater order in the use of the ether may be provided and the congestion may be relieved. At the same time, so rapidly does the art change, so quickly are improvements made, so unexpectedly do new contingencies arise, that it has been thought best to confer in general terms upon the regulatory body very broad powers of supervision and control. Statute law is fixed and inflexible and unsuited to a rapidly changing situation. It is therefore best to leave the situation so that new conditions and emergencies may be promptly met.

Sections 1 and 2 of the bill deal with station licenses; section 3 with operators' licenses; section 4 with approvals of stations to be built or now building; section 5 with creation of an advisory committee; section 6 with continued presence of licensed radio operator listening in on wave lengths designated for distress signals during the entire period the transmitter is in operation at a radio-telephone station the signals of which can interfere with ship communications; section 7 with the elimination of the specified normal and other wave lengths provided in the first and second regulations in the act of August, 1912, with the elimination of the regulations dealing with the "pure wave" and "sharp wave," and with the extension of the wave lengths accorded amateur stations by eliminating the definite wave length accorded amateurs and according them a wider range, to wit, not less than 150 meters nor more than 275 meters; section 8 with penalties for violations of the act or knowingly making false oath or affirmation for the purpose of securing a permit or a license; section 9 with a schedule of fees to be collected for transmitting stations and operators' licenses; section 10 with the extension of the operation of the act of August 13, 1912, from naval and military stations as therein specified to all Government stations; and section 11 with the repeal of all acts or parts of acts in conflict with the pending act.

It must be emphasized that the pending bill does not undertake to deal with the stations which receive only. Of these stations there are estimated to be 2,000,000.

The committee feels that this Congress should not adjourn without this legislation, which it feels to be of great public concern.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. I ask leave to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Chairman, I ask the same privilege for myself, to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. All debate on the section and pending amendments is exhausted. The gentleman may ask unanimous consent.

Mr. LONDON. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, it is my belief that this bill confers upon the Secretary of Commerce the power to regulate stations intended to operate within the boundaries of a State, and in a way that is inevitable.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLAND] mentioned the word "navigation." Under the same power that Congress exercises the right of regulation under the Constitution in the matter of navigation it will be able to regulate and completely destroy every transmitting line within a State if Congress should choose to do so. It will then be dealing with aerial navigation, with streams of air instead of water, with currents of power instead of water; and once Congress has assumed to legislate for the air and matters involving currents of air and currents of power within the air, it can control transmitting stations within the States. It is very likely if this should come to the Supreme Court, that the Supreme Court would construe this bill to permit the control of intra-state stations.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Does not the gentleman think Congress ought to control it?

Mr. LONDON. Well, I think something ought to be done.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, what is the parliamentary status?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HUDSPETH] offers a motion, which is pending. Also a motion to strike out the last word was pending, and a motion was made in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. TILSON. I would like to be recognized, but I would like to have the amendment put first.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. TILSON. I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. TILSON. Could we not dispose of the pending amendment, Mr. Chairman? I would like to have the pending amendment disposed of and out of the way, if there is one pending.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the gentleman know what it is?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pending pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the "noes" appeared to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is asked for.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 8, noes 40.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LONDON: Page 4, line 20, at the end of section 1 add the following: "The action of the Secretary of Commerce under this section or any other section of this act shall be subject to review by the courts at the instance of any interested party."

Mr. MADDEN. Would not that be true even if this language were not inserted?

Mr. LONDON. No; it would not be true, for this reason—

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. I make the point of order that the reservation is too late, because there had been a communication between the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON].

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order raised by the gentleman from Texas is sustained. The gentleman from New York will proceed.

Mr. LONDON. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that it would be true ordinarily, because you can not oust the courts of jurisdiction; but the gentleman from Maine [Mr. WHITE], in explaining the object of the bill, made it very clear that one of its purposes was to grant absolute discretion to the Secretary of Commerce. In other words, his decision in the matter of granting a license to an operator, his decision in the matter of granting permission to construct a transmitting station or in refusing the right to construct it, will be absolute and final. He will be the final arbiter. You are dealing with an entirely new subject with infinite possibilities. Its growth is so rapid that it is almost impossible to follow it. Within 5 or 10 years the subject matter may change not only in quantity but in quality, and may assume an entirely different character from that which it now possesses. I do not like the idea of vesting in one individual the extraordinary power of controlling an entirely new function, an entirely new industry, an entirely new field of activity, and I would, therefore, make the conservative suggestion that our courts should have the power to review the action of the Secretary of Commerce at the instance of an aggrieved party.

Mr. ROACH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ROACH. I agree with the view of the gentleman on this matter, and I believe that if his amendment is adopted it is intended to allow any party who feels himself to be aggrieved by the action of the Secretary of Commerce to appeal.

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. ROACH. In other words, the law merely gives the Secretary of Commerce certain discretionary powers to make certain regulations, and if he proceeds in accordance with the statute to make those regulations would a mere review reach the matter of a grievance, or would it be necessary for the aggrieved party to take an appeal?

Mr. LONDON. It would be necessary for the aggrieved party to take the matter to court and to complain of the refusal of the Secretary of Commerce to grant the license.

Mr. ROACH. I just wanted to get the gentleman's viewpoint on that.

Mr. LONDON. In addition to that, here you are permitting the Secretary of Commerce to establish regulations. You will recall how the regulations issued during the war were being changed every day. You will recall the numerous interpretations of regulations issued by the various bureaus. You would never know how to proceed yourself, or how to advise somebody else to proceed under those regulations.

Mr. ROACH. The Secretary in the issuance of these regulations and the exercise of the other authority and discretion that he has acts strictly in accordance with the provisions of this law. Now will the mere matter of a review of his action afford relief to an injured party? Would it not be better to provide for an appeal by an aggrieved party from the action of the Secretary of Commerce?

Mr. LONDON. I believe the expression "subject to review by the courts" accomplishes that very purpose.

Mr. BLANTON. That would permit a mandamus proceeding.

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. EDMONDS. Suppose some man was creating chaos in the air, so that nobody within his radius could use their apparatus, and the Secretary should stop him. Could he go into court under the gentleman's amendment and get an injunction and restrain the Secretary until he had the case heard in court?

Mr. LONDON. If he could get a judge to issue temporary injunctions with the same facility with which they are being issued against organized labor, I will say yes, he could; but ordinarily a judge would ask substantial and convincing proof before he would grant an injunction.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON]. I think it would be most unfortunate and almost disastrous to the purpose of this legislation to adopt this amendment. I will read it to the committee for a little further information.

The action of the Secretary of Commerce under this section or any other section of this act shall be subject to review by the courts at the instance of any interested party.

What does that mean? It simply means that you are opening the courts for review of the acts of an administrative officer. This act gives the Secretary of Commerce discretion. Of course, that is not a personal discretion. It is an administrative discretion. He must follow the language and the intent and the spirit of the law. This law lays down the limitations and the restrictions and conditions under which he may exercise his discretion. It is not an absolute, tyrannical power. I am not going to express a legal opinion on the question, but I would be very much surprised if any action of any officer could not be subject to some legal procedure based upon a charge of abuse of power or abuse of discretion, but I do not want to make this law subject to review by every interested party who can not get what he wants, and thereupon might go into court and substitute the court for the administrative officer. That is what it means, that you are substituting the court for the Secretary of Commerce, and that if you can not get what you want from the Secretary of Commerce you will go to some court and substitute the court for him.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I yield to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Is it not true that practically every interest was opposed to any such provision as this?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Oh, yes.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. All those whom I will designate as the small fellows were afraid of this court review. They preferred, if I got their viewpoint correctly, to take their chances with the Secretary of Commerce rather than trust to interminable litigation.

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. On the amendment?

Mr. LONDON. Yes, on the amendment. Under subdivision "O," page 7, the Secretary of Commerce is to determine, among other things, "the character and financial, technical, and other ability of the applicant to operate the station." He is to determine the character, which may mean the composite virtues and vices, the man's reputation—he is to determine the financial, technical, and other ability of the applicant. Does not that offer a wide possibility of discretion? And that wide range of discretion runs throughout the bill.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. But does the gentleman want the courts to determine as to his ability?

Mr. LONDON. I want the applicant to have a chance with somebody other than the Secretary of Commerce.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I submit that in an administrative measure designed to regulate and control business by business methods, and for the purpose of securing rights in the management of a business, it certainly would be a very mistaken policy to substitute the courts for an administrative officer in the execution of the kind of a power conferred by this bill.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JONES of Texas as a substitute to the amendment offered by Mr. LONDON: Page 4, line 20, after the word "act," insert the following proviso: "Provided, That from any action of the Secretary of Commerce in refusing or revoking a license, the person whose license is revoked or refused shall have the right to appeal to a court of competent jurisdiction, which court shall have the power to confirm, modify, or reverse the decision of the Secretary, but the decision of the Secretary of Commerce shall not be suspended pending the decision of such court."

Mr. JONES of Texas. I just wish to state in this connection that that amendment follows a provision which was put in the packers bill and practically all the great bills passed by the House. It provides for an appeal but does not interfere with the decision of the Secretary of Commerce until after the decision of the court. It gives the right but does not interfere with the work of the Secretary of Commerce. In other words, the decision would be in full force until the court had taken action upon the measure.

Mr. LONDON. I believe the substitute the gentleman has offered is taken from a now existing statute?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I have followed it from memory, but it practically follows the amendment which was put in the Federal Trade Commission and the packers bill and other bills of that character. In other words, the man who has a license or is refused a license or his license is revoked, if not satisfied, it gives him the right to appeal to the court, but the decision of the Secretary of Commerce will remain in force and effect until it is suspended or reversed by a court of competent jurisdiction. It seems to me that when you are putting so much power in the hands of the Secretary of Commerce it is only right to give an individual who thinks his rights have been denied a right to resort to the court and have that determined. He should at least be protected to that extent. In the meantime all the regulations by the Secretary of Commerce would remain in full force and effect until such time as action by the court was taken. That seems only fair and just and right.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I am willing to accept the substitute offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I object. I think the last amendment is worse than the first.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I have been seeking in the Committee of the Whole to get an intelligent understanding of this bill in order to give it my support. I think some regulation is absolutely necessary in this matter.

But it does seem to me that we are drifting into a field that nobody knows much about, except as they have learned it in the last 12 months, when there has been more done in this line of transmission of communication by radio than at any other period of our history. I want seriously to call the attention of the committee to one matter that is pertinent and germane to this substitute offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES]. That is on page 10, lines 15 to 19, inclusive. I would like to have the committee give attention to this language:

An operator's license shall be issued only to a person who, in the judgment of the Secretary of Commerce, is proficient in the use and operation of radio apparatus and in the transmission and reception of radiograms by telegraphy and telephony.

I want to call the attention of the committee to the great discoverers and inventors relative to electricity. I want to call your attention to Ben Franklin. Suppose Ben Franklin had been living during this day and time, would you seek to regulate him by governmental authority because he experimented by sending a kite into the air to draw down the electricity? How about Edison in his youth when he was experimenting with electricity? And there are thousands of young men all over this country who are trying to discover and who are testing out different apparatus and are seeking to invent and to improve inventions with reference to this great art and discovery of radio communication.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ABERNETHY. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. This provision is about the same that you find in the municipal codes of our cities for the licensing of plumbers and electricians. There is nothing wrong about that.

Mr. ABERNETHY. But I would say to the gentleman that under this provision before a young man can undertake to send out any message he has to go before the Secretary of Commerce and stand an examination and be found proficient.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. He has to be proficient in the use of the machine.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Suppose he invents a machine. They tell me that you can go to work and take a little thing that is not larger than my hand and receive a message with it. We do not know anything about this matter. The whole matter, in my opinion, is in its infancy.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. This has nothing to do with receiving messages. This is sending messages, transmitting messages, sending them out into the air to go where they will.

Mr. ABERNETHY. What does the word "reception" mean in line 18 on page 10? I asked the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS] that question awhile ago.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ABERNETHY. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I will tell the gentleman now what I told him then, that this provides that a man must be proficient in the use and operation of radio apparatus and in the transmission and reception of radiograms. In other words, he must be qualified to send and receive, because all commercial stations both send and receive, and it is not telephony alone but telegraphy. In other words, he must know the Morse code, or whatever code is being used, before he would be able to either send or receive messages, and this simply refers to an operator who is engaged as an operator in a commercial business and has no application at all and the bill has no application whatever to a receiving set, a receiving station, or an operator in such a station.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I want to ask the gentleman from Tennessee if telephony can not be carried on without the Morse code?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. It could not be carried on by anyone who did not know how to manage the apparatus.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto do now close.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Texas to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. JONES of Texas) there were—ayes 9, noes 41.

So the substitute was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LONDON) there were—ayes 8, noes 29.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a point of order for the purpose of referring for a moment to the form of this bill. I am very much in favor of the bill. I think that the committee has done a fine piece of work and deserves great credit. I congratulate the gentleman from Maine [Mr. WHITE] and his colleagues on the subcommittee upon the excellent work they have done, and I wish to make special mention of the members of the subcommittee on the minority side who have not only helped in the construction of the bill but have done valiant service in its defense here to-day.

As the Chair will note, this bill attempts to strike out certain sections of a law and insert certain sections of this bill in lieu of the sections stricken out. Then it proceeds to add a number of other sections which are not referred to in the opening paragraph of the first section. The Clerk in reading should not have stopped where he did, because the first section of the bill does not end until line 16 on page 11. That is the end of the first section of the bill. There should follow section 2 instead of section 4, because it should be section 2 of this bill. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I ask that the Clerk may continue the reading of the section until he finishes it and then I shall ask the privilege of offering an amendment in order to straighten out the section numbering.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not agree with the position taken by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] that the first section of the bill extends to line 16, page 11. Either this bill is one section, extending from the enacting clause to the end, or else it is a bill consisting of 11 sections. The question of whether bills should be considered by paragraphs or sections is a matter of custom. No specific rule covers this question. It is the invariable practice that appropriation bills and revenue bills shall be considered by paragraphs, and all other bills by sections. The Chair directs the attention of the committee to the fact that in the very first paragraph of this bill it is suggested that sections 1, 2, and 3 of the present law, approved August 13, 1912, should be amended by inserting in lieu thereof sections 1, 2, and 3 following. Instead of the committee going ahead and merely substituting one section as 1, 2, and 3, it has substituted many other sections without changing the sections of the bill, by noting that section 4 and the numbered sections following should be designated section 2. If the quotation marks of the substituted part for existing law, sections 1, 2, and 3, had been found at the end of what purports to be in this bill the amendment of sections 1, 2, and 3, there might be some potency to the position taken by the gentleman from Connecticut; but the Chair will hold that in the consideration of bills, the important and guiding question, where no counter practice prevails, is to consider the measure according to distinct substantive proposals, so that there may be the best legislative consideration to the various provisions, and the Chair holds in this particular instance that it is better for the consideration by the committee to have the bill read by sections as numbered, and the Clerk will now read section 2.

Mr. TILSON. May I ask the Chair where does section 1 of this bill end? It begins in line 1, of course. Now, where does the section which begins on line 1 end?

The CHAIRMAN. As the Chair stated in the ruling on the gentleman's point of order section 1, strictly speaking, includes everything from the enacting clause to the end of the bill.

Mr. TILSON. That is section 1.

The CHAIRMAN. In effect, but it has not been so offered by the committee as section 1. The committee in the first paragraph seeks to substitute for sections 1, 2, and 3 of the existing law sections 1, 2, and 3, and then follows that with other sections. It is not for the Chair to pass upon the question whether the following sections are intended to be in substitution of sections 1, 2, and 3. The committee did not report sections 1, 2, and 3 only, but reported 11 sections, and the Chair holds, as it is a matter for the convenience of the committee to pass upon that plan which makes it best from a legislative standpoint in the consideration of these substantive matters, that this bill be considered by sections as they appear, and the Clerk will read.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the bill under our new rule because of the paragraph on the top of page 14, which appropriates money in violation of the rules of the House. The Chair will note it is an appropriation, that this committee seeks to appropriate and make available and make payable certain remuneration of $25 a day for six individuals, together with traveling expenses and clerical expenses, and it is a clear violation of the rules of the House.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman's point of order is not timely.

Mr. BLANTON. You can make it at any time.

Mr. TILSON. We have not reached that portion of the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. But you can make the point at any time.

Mr. TILSON. It has not been read.

The CHAIRMAN. The rule is very clear. Rule XXI, paragraph 5, provides that against any bill or resolution carrying an appropriation which is beyond the power of the committee to appropriate the point of order may be made at any time. The gentleman so far is within his rights in that particular.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I submit it is not an appropriation, but it is an authorization.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair holds it is not an appropriation, but an authorization, and overrules the point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. May I cite the Chair to a precedent that the Chair himself caused to be made? I cite the Chair to a bill which authorized a certain amount of unexpended appropriation to be used, and the present occupant of the chair from the floor raised the question that that was an appropriation, and the distinguished occupant of the chair at that time sustained it, and I offer him his own precedent in support of the fact that money which has been already appropriated, which a legislative committee authorized to be expended in a legislative bill, is an appropriation and not an authorization.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. May I offer a suggestion: That a guilty conscience needs no acoustics?

The CHAIRMAN. As the gentleman is within his rights at making this point of order at any time, it will be a courtesy to withhold or withdraw the point of order, so as to review—

Mr. BLANTON. I will withdraw it so the Chair can find the precedent which he was instrumental in setting.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair may have been a better advocate in that instance than the Presiding Officer.

Mr. BLANTON. I withdraw the point of order; I will withhold it for the present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, strike out lines 3 to 6, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "That sections 1, 2, and 3 of the act entitled 'An act to regulate radio communications,' approved August 13, 1912, are hereby amended to read as follows."

Mr. TILSON. In view of the fact that I have conferred in this matter with the gentleman from Maine and others in trying to straighten out the numbering of the sections, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for three minutes to explain the effect of my amendment in spite of the fact that debate has been closed.

The CHAIRMAN. Notwithstanding the order of the committee that debate should be closed on this section, the gentleman asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for three minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, it is important that we have this bill in the usual form. The amendment to the language following the enacting clause, and really a part of it, which I have sent to the desk, will, if adopted, put that part of the bill into the usual form. In my judgment, as well as in the judgment of the other gentlemen with whom I have conferred, this will straighten out the section marking of the bill and make it in accordance with the usual legislation of this House.

Mr. HOCH. When we get further on down to what is section 4, I presume an amendment will be in order then?

Mr. TILSON. When we get to section 4 I shall move to strike out "Sec. 4" and insert "Sec. 2," which will mean section 2 of this act.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, right in that connection this bill, if enacted into law, will supplement the existing statute, and I think it would be more intelligent for us to say first, second, and third sections, followed by 4, 5, and 6, and so forth, just as it is in this bill; otherwise you will have two parts of the section in the same act.

Mr. TILSON. No; it is not in the same act. There will be two separate and distinct acts. One of them you are amending. Your first section amends sections 1, 2, and 3 of that act, "to read as follows," and you set that out. That is what this act does in its first section. Following that you have a number of sections that you yourselves have added. They are not sections of the former act. They are sections 2, 3, 4, 5, and so on, of this very bill that we are now considering, and should be so numbered.

Mr. BLANTON. I think the gentleman is absolutely right about that.

Mr. EDMONDS. I think the gentleman from Connecticut is exactly right. This section 4 should be section 2, because we have left in the old act a section 4. If you follow the suggestion of the gentleman from Connecticut, these sections will fall in their proper place.

Mr. TILSON. There will be great confusion if we do not change the bill. I think that the amendment I have offered will completely adjust the matter. I therefore ask the adoption of my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. A. Paragraph A of section 1 of this act shall not apply to persons sending radio messages or signals on a foreign ship while the same is within the jurisdiction of the United States.

B. The station license required hereby shall not be granted to, or after the granting thereof such license shall not in any manner, either voluntarily or involuntarily, be transferred to (a) any alien or the representative of any alien; (b) nor to any foreign government or the representative thereof; (c) nor to any company, corporation, or association organized under the laws of any foreign government; (d) nor to any company, corporation, or association of which any officer or director is an alien or of which more than one-fifth of the capital stock is owned, controlled, or voted by aliens or their representatives or by a foreign government or representative thereof, or by any company, corporation, or association organized under the laws of a foreign country.

Such station license, the wave length or lengths authorized to be used by the licensee, and the rights therein granted shall not be transferred, assigned, or in any manner, either voluntarily or involuntarily, disposed of to any other person, company, or corporation without the consent in writing of the Secretary of Commerce.

C. The Secretary of Commerce, subject to the limitations of this act, in his discretion, may grant to any applicant therefor a station license provided for in sections 1 and 2 hereof.

No license granted by the Secretary shall be for a longer term than 10 years, and any license granted may be revoked as hereinafter provided. Upon the expiration of any license the Secretary, in his discretion, upon application thereof, may grant a renewal of such license for the same or for a lesser period of time.

The Secretary of Commerce is hereby authorized to refuse a station license to any person, company, or corporation, or any subsidiary thereof, which, in the judgment of the Secretary, is monopolizing or seeking to monopolize radio communication, directly or indirectly, through the control of the manufacture or sale of radio apparatus or by any other means. The granting of a license shall not estop the United States from prosecuting such person, company, or corporation for a violation of the law against monopolies or restraint of trade.

The Secretary of Commerce in granting any license for a commercial station intended or used for communication between the United States or any territory or possession, continental or insular, subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, the Canal Zone, or the Philippine Islands, and any foreign country, may impose any terms, conditions, or restrictions authorized to be imposed with respect to submarine cable licenses by section 2 of an act entitled "An act relating to the landing and the operation of submarine cables in the United States," approved May 27, 1921. Every license for such commercial station shall be approved by the President before the same shall be issued and become effective.

D. The Secretary of Commerce may grant licenses only upon written application therefor addressed to him, which application shall set forth such facts as he by regulations may prescribe as to the citizenship, character, and financial, technical, and other ability of the applicant to operate the station; the ownership and location of the proposed station and of the stations with which it is proposed to communicate; the wave lengths and the power desired to be used; the hours of the day or other periods of time during which it is proposed to operate the station; the purposes for which the station is to be used; and such other information as he may require. Such application shall be signed by the applicant under oath or affirmation.

E. Such station licenses as the Secretary of Commerce may grant shall be in such general form as he may prescribe, but each license shall contain, in addition to other provisions, a statement of the following conditions to which such license shall be subject: (a) The ownership or management of the station or apparatus therein shall not be transferred in violation of this act. There shall be no vested property right in the license issued for such station or in the bands of wave lengths authorized to be used therein, and neither the license nor any right granted thereunder shall be assigned or otherwise transferred in violation of this act; (b) such license shall contain such other conditions, not inconsistent with this act, as the Secretary of Commerce may prescribe.

F. Any station license granted by the Secretary of Commerce shall be revocable by him for failure to operate service substantially as proposed in the application and as set forth in the license, for violation of or failure to observe any of the restrictions and conditions of this act, or of any regulation of the Secretary of Commerce authorized by this act or by the provisions of any international radio convention ratified or adhered to by the United States, or any regulations thereunder, or whenever any licensee, who is a common carrier, shall fail, in the judgment of the Secretary of Commerce, to provide reasonable facilities for the transmission of messages, or whenever the Interstate Commerce Commission, in the exercise of the authority conferred upon it by law, shall find that any licensee has made any unjust and unreasonable charge, or has made or prescribed any unjust and unreasonable classification, regulation, or practice with respect to the transmission of messages or service, or whenever the Secretary of Commerce shall deem such revocation to be in the public interest: Provided, That no order of revocation shall take effect until 30 days' notice in writing thereof, stating the cause for the proposed revocation, to the parties known by the Secretary to be interested in such license. Any person in interest aggrieved by said order may make written application to the Secretary at any time within said 30 days for a hearing upon such order, and upon the filing of such written application said order of revocation shall stand suspended until the conclusion of the hearing herein directed. Notice in writing of said hearing shall be given by the Secretary to all the parties known to him to be interested in such license 20 days prior to the time of said hearing. Said hearing shall be conducted under such rules and in such manner as the Secretary may prescribe. Upon the conclusion thereof the Secretary may affirm, modify, or revoke said orders of revocation.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. I understand that the chairman in charge of the bill is willing for the paragraph on top of page 14 to go out, and I only make the point of order as to that paragraph.

I want to call the attention of the Chair to a specific case that he will remember. When the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] brought in his resolution to apply the prohibition laws to certain island possessions of the United States the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] made a point of order against the resolution because it, in effect, though not specifically, appropriated money, and the Speaker sustained the point of order, holding that the resolution would require part of the money which was already appropriated to be expended in these island possessions of the United States, and while the bill did not specifically appropriate money, it required money already appropriated to be expended, which was in effect an appropriation.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. I can not read this as the gentleman does. If the gentleman will read with me on page 14, beginning "shall be paid from the appropriation made to the Department of Commerce for this purpose."

Mr. BLANTON. It does not say "to be made," but it says "made." There is already an appropriation to the Department of Commerce for this purpose for radio control under the former act.

Mr. TILSON. Oh, no; it is for the necessary expenses of the members of the committee, their meetings, and it means only that out of any money that Congress appropriates for this purpose the Department of Commerce may pay the necessary expenses of the members of this committee in going to and from while attending the meetings of the committee, and so forth, and that is all it can mean. It says "for this purpose." That is just as specific as it can be.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The Chair has not been able to find the particular case referred to by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], nor has the gentleman from Texas called the attention of the Chair to that case. The decisions before the Chair where a point of order was made because of an appropriation that was carried were those wherein specific authority was granted to utilize certain appropriations and made the money available.

The paragraph in the bill to which the gentleman raises a point of order, although it has not been reached in regular order for consideration, is as follows:

The necessary expenses of the members of the committee in going to, returning from, and while attending meetings of the committee, including clerical expenses and supplies, together with a per diem of $25 to each of the six members not otherwise employed in the Government service, for attendance at the meetings, shall be paid from the appropriation made to the Department of Commerce for this purpose.

The inspection of that language indicates that it is legislative in character. There is no other way for a legislative committee of the House to authorize the expenditure of expenses than by providing it in language in this way. If perchance there happens to be an appropriation available for that purpose, that does not mean that this bill is carrying an appropriation. It may affect the appropriation, but it does not carry one, and it is not the purpose of the rule restricting committees from making appropriations to prevent them considering and reporting legislative authorizations. It is clearly an authorization. Otherwise a legislative committee would not have any means of providing authorizations for expenditure if perchance there happened to be some appropriation that might be available for that purpose.

The Chair overrules the point of order and sustains the former offhand ruling, that it is not subject to a point of order.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves that the committee do now rise. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. STAFFORD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill (H. R. 13773) to amend an act to regulate radio communication, approved August 13, 1912, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

"Fourth. What money or property is now owned or controlled by such board.

"Fifth. Where such funds, if any, are now deposited and what, if any, interest has been drawn on same since December 31, 1920."

I transmit herewith a memorandum which has been sent to me by Mr. George A. Zabriskie, president of the United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.), giving the data requested in the said resolution.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I ask leave to submit a resolution and have it referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia. DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13600) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. MCKELLAR, on page 10, after line 22, to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That the appropriation in this section shall not become available until the Public Utilities Commission shall fix rates of fare for the street railway companies in the District of Columbia at rates not in excess of the rates of fare fixed in existing charters or contracts heretofore entered into between said companies and the Congress, and on and after February 1, 1923, said companies shall receive a rate of fare not exceeding 5 cents per passenger, and six tickets shall be sold for 25 cents.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, when we took a recess on yesterday afternoon the question before the Senate was a point of order raised by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS] against the amendment which I offered. Am I to understand that the Senator insists upon the point of order or is he willing to let the Senate vote on the amendment offered by me? It is clearly a limitation, and will the Senator withdraw the point of order and let the Senate vote on the amendment?

Mr. PHIPPS. I regret that I can not accede to the Senator's suggestion. On the other hand, I had hoped that the Senator would, after having considered the question further, see that his amendment is clearly inadmissible and withdraw it. I think it would be better procedure if he were to do that.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Quite the contrary, I have come to the conclusion that it is unquestionably a limitation upon an appropriation and so clearly in order that I thought the Senator from Colorado would withdraw his point of order, because I am quite sure the Chair will not sustain the point of order against an amendment so clearly a limitation upon an appropriation.

Mr. PHIPPS. I have made the point of order.

Mr. HARRISON. Does the Senator desire to argue the point of order?

Mr. PHIPPS. I at least desire to make a statement as to what I base it on. The amendment is not merely a limitation but it is clearly new legislation on an appropriation bill and general legislation.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. MCKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HARRISON. The proviso is clearly in order if the rules of the Senate and the decisions of Presiding Officers are to be followed. It so happens in this particular case that the very point has been decided, and it was decided quite recently, on a proposition advanced exactly as this is now proposed. The amendment was in exactly the same language against which the point of order was made and ruled upon. I take it the only thing necessary is to recall to the Presiding Officer that ruling, because it settles the proposition, it seems to me, unless we are going to have one decision one way one day and change it the next day.

On March 7, 1922, and I refer to page 3486 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of that date, when the District of Columbia appropriation bill was being considered, I offered an amendment to an item carrying an appropriation for the various employees. The amendment was in the exact wording of the proposed amendment now offered. To the amendment which I then offered the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS], who now makes the point of order, made a point of order. He said at that time in support of his point of order exactly what he has stated this morning in support of his present point of order. The colloquy which took place is not long, but it is so apropos that I wish to read it:

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I regret that I can not see my way clear to accept the amendment. I think it is clearly subject to a point of order, and it is my duty to make the point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What is the point of order?

Mr. PHIPPS. The point of order is that it is legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. HARRISON. Of course, Mr. President, it is purely a limitation upon the appropriations, and it does not change existing law.

The pending amendment is merely carrying out, I may say, a provision of the original charter which gave to these concerns the right to charge a 5-cent fare.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi is in the following language:

"Provided, That this appropriation shall not become available until the Public Utilities Commission shall have issued and made effective an order requiring the street railway companies operating in the District of Columbia to give transportation—"

And so forth.

Under the form in which the amendment is presented, the Chair—

Then the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] interrupted and said:

Mr. JONES of Washington. Will the Chair permit me to suggest that we have no rule in the Senate similar to that in the House permitting limitations upon appropriations? The House has an express rule, according to my recollection, making in order a limitation upon an appropriation, but the Senate has no such rule as that, and it seems to me this really is legislation on an appropriation bill.

I want to say that personally I am in favor of the proposition. I have been urging for quite a good while a reduction in the passenger rates on street cars in the District. I have thought that these companies have been charging exorbitant rates; but I would not like to see the principle established in the Senate that by a limitation on an appropriation we can nullify existing law, and that is what it would amount to. We nullify it for a year, we nullify it for two years, we nullify it for three years. I think it is very unfortunate that there is a rule of that kind in any legislative body.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield.

I need pay no tribute to the ability of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] as a parliamentarian in this body—

Mr. LENROOT. I think the Senator is mistaken. There is no such rule in the House. The limitation rule applies upon general principles, that a limitation does not change existing law, that a limitation upon an appropriation is not either new or general legislation.

Mr. JONES of Washington. My recollection was that there was an express rule. I may be mistaken in that respect. I know it is the uniform practice.

Mr. LENROOT. Of course, there is the Holman law, so called, but that has no application.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks it is competent for the Senate to limit the use of any appropriation that it authorizes—

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will hear the Senator from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I did not mean to interrupt the occupant of the chair. I wanted to ask a question before the Chair rules finally.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will hear the Senator from New York.

The Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] then proceeded to discuss the amendment and the point of order. I may state in this connection that the Presiding Officer at that time was the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], than whom there is no better parliamentarian in this body—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON). It is true that any limitation may have the practical effect of accomplishing legislation in advance. Under the rules of the Senate the present occupant of the chair thinks that it is competent for the Senate, in providing an appropriation, to limit its use, and that that limitation is accomplished by the specification of a condition under which the appropriation may be used just as well as otherwise.

Under the form in which the amendment is presented the Chair thinks that it is not general legislation in the sense of Rule XVI of the Senate and that it is not obnoxious to the rule, and therefore the Chair overrules the point of order. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi.

Then the vote was taken upon the proposition and it was defeated.

There is a case absolutely in point. If the Senate is going to adopt the rule and practice of not abiding by a decision rendered by a competent parliamentarian presiding over the Senate one day simply because some one else may be presiding the next day and a point of order may then be made by some other Senator, well and good; but I submit that clearly the practice should not be followed and that, in view of the decision to which I have called the attention of the Chair, the pending point of order should be overruled.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I think as a general rule, of course, it is very desirable that decisions which serve as precedents should be sustained, but instances of overruling decisions in the Senate and, indeed, in other parliamentary bodies are sufficiently common. It seems to me that the defect in the pending amendment which makes it out of order is the fact that it does not limit an appropriation. I do not recall whether there is a rule in the House—I did not remember that there was—but I know it has been decided in the House that in making an appropriation, for example, for the building of a vessel under a naval appropriation bill it has been held that a limitation on the method of expending that appropriation was in order.

In this case the proposed amendment is not a limitation on the appropriation at all, but imposes a condition upon it, involving, as it seems to me, new legislation. It does not propose to direct how the sums appropriated for the Public Utilities Commission shall be expended, which I understand is the subject to which it is directed, but it provides that none of the money proposed to be appropriated shall be expended unless the Public Utilities Commission shall perform certain acts. That appears to me to be not strictly a limitation on the appropriation, but general legislation.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I should like to read from the Manual of Rules and Practice of the House of Representatives. My recollection of the proposed amendment is that it goes further than a mere limitation on the appropriation and endeavors to limit the discretion of executive officers as to some other proposition. Here is what I find in the House Manual of Rules and Practice:

Although the rule forbids on any general appropriation bill a provision "changing existing law," which is construed to mean legislation generally, the House's practice has established the principle that certain "limitations" may be admitted. It being established that the House under its rules may decline to appropriate for a purpose authorized by law, so it may by limitation prohibit the use of the money for part of the purpose while appropriating for the remainder of it (IV, 3936). The language of the limitation provides that no part of the appropriation under consideration shall be used for a certain designated purpose (IV, 3917-3926). And this designated purpose may reach the question of qualifications, for while it is not in order to legislate as to the qualifications of the recipients of an appropriation, the House may specify that no part of the appropriation shall go to recipients lacking certain qualifications (IV, 3942-3952).

But here is what I wish to call particularly to the attention of the Chair:

The limitation must apply solely to the money of the appropriation under consideration and may not be made applicable to money appropriated in other acts (IV, 3927, 3928). (Chairman CAMPBELL, June 12, 1919, p. 1063.) The limitation may not be applied directly to the official functions of executive officers (IV, 3957-3966), but it may restrict executive discretion so far as this may be done by a simple negative on the use of the appropriation (IV, 3968-3972; also rulings by Chairman FOSTER on the Indian appropriation bill, February 5, 1916, 1st sess. 64th Cong., p. 2161, and Chairman RAINEY on the Post Office appropriation bill, February 24, 1916, 1st sess. 64th Cong., p. 3094).

But such limitations must not give affirmative directions (IV, 3854-3859, 3975), and must not impose new duties upon an executive officer (Chairman CRISP, March 11, 1916, 1st sess. 64th Cong., p. 3970); and must not be coupled with legislation not directly instrumental in affecting a reduction. (Chairman SAUNDERS, February 18, 1918, p. 2280.)

It seems to me that when we attempt to limit the discretion of executive officers in this instance, providing that the money proposed to be appropriated shall not be used unless they take certain action with reference to street-car rates, and so on, it does not come even within the rule established by the practice of the other House.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from Washington is quite right. This provision is in reference to a subject which is not involved in the appropriation at all.

Mr. JONES of Washington. We have a different rule. Our rule not only prohibits legislation of a general character upon appropriation bills but it prohibits new legislation. It seems to me that if the proposed legislation shall amount to anything, it is new legislation upon an appropriation bill. It may not be permanent; indeed, it is not permanent, as it only applies, of course, to the next fiscal year; but, if it is to be effective at all, it seems to me it would be legislation; and, if legislation, it is new legislation, and comes within the specific terms of our rule, which is different from the previous rule.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is inclined to follow the precedents which the Senate set no longer ago than last March, upon which there was no appeal, and which evidently stands as the rule of the Senate. The Chair would, therefore, rule that the amendment is in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I will now call attention to the reason why this amendment should be adopted. I shall first consider the Capital Traction Co., if Senators will listen to me for just a moment. That company is capitalized at $12,000,000. I wish to refer to a statement which was published in the Washington Star of January 11, instant, from which it appears that the Capital Traction Co. paid a dividend on its capital stock of 7 per cent. It charged up to profit and loss $1,354,567.24. According to this statement, its net earnings were in the neighborhood of 13 per cent. I wonder how the Public Utilities Commission could ever think that these earnings were confiscatory of the company's property. The commission claim that they have fixed the valuation of the company's property at $18,000,000. Assuming that that was done, the dividend declared would be more than 8 per cent upon the entire amount of the entire value of the company's property.

I wish to say—and that is why I asked the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS] to withdraw his point of order—that in the pending bill we are proposing to appropriate large sums of money, amounting to thousands of dollars, for free automobiles and their upkeep. We are granting free automobile transportation to those who are amply able to pay for their own transportation, and yet we permit the Public Utilities Commission to put a tax of $1.50 upon every man or woman in the District of Columbia who has to go to and from his or her work on street cars. A tax of $1.50 a month is placed upon each citizen who is unable to buy an automobile or who has not sufficient "pull" with the Government to have one allotted to him or her.

I wish to say to the Senate that there is no reason under heaven that I can see for Congress permitting this company longer to violate the contract which it made with the Government. It made a contract in good faith; it is demanding of the Government full compliance with the Government's part of the contract under its charter, and yet it is violating the agreement which it made with the Government to give 5-cent fares to the citizens of the District. Its action is indefensible; it can not be defended by anyone, and I doubt whether anyone will rise here to defend 8-cent fares in the light of the undisputed fact, namely, that this company is paying a 7 per cent dividend upon its capital stock and has carried to surplus almost as much more.

It is inconceivable to me that we would be willing to legislate in such a way as to permit that condition to continue.

Now, with reference to the other company, as we all know that company has kited its stock about, it has consolidated various companies. It has a capital of $15,000,000, consisting of $8,500,000 of preferred stock and $6,500,000 of common stock. The company claims to have $30,000,000 of assets. It declared a 5 per cent dividend upon the preferred stock only, but it put to profit-and-loss account $414,818.31, or enough to have paid a 6 per cent dividend on its common stock, all of which, I am informed, is water, and now it claims to be entitled to earn, although having but $8,500,000 of preferred stock and only $6,500,000 of common stock, a 6 per cent return on $30,000,000, which it sets up as a fair valuation of its property.

Is the Congress going to be a party to permitting this company to earn such dividends upon watered stock? I am reliably informed that every dollar of the $6,500,000 of common stock is watered; that not a dollar was ever paid for it; and I understand that for a while it sold around Washington for a few cents on the dollar. In other words, it is stock used for control, as we understand that description; anyway, it is purely watered stock, and yet the Congress is asked to tax all the citizens of Washington who use the lines of the company at the rate of $1.50 a month extra in order to make up dividends which are greater than other similar companies earn on actual money invested. Under these circumstances it seems to me that Congress should adopt the amendment.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to call attention to an article that appeared in the Washington Post of this morning entitled "Law bars 5-cent fare, critics in Senate told." I quote from the article as follows:

While the congressional charters of Washington street car companies provide a 5-cent fare, or six tickets for 25 cents, Congress by its own action in creating the District Public Utilities Commission gave that body rate-fixing powers, directing it to fix public-utility rates at a point that will yield a fair return on property value.

I digress here long enough to say that it was argued when the bill creating the Public Utilities Commission was under discussion that it would mean cheaper fares for the people of Washington. They were not satisfied with a fare of six tickets for a quarter, but they wanted cheaper fares, and it was argued by those who favored the bill at that time that it would mean cheaper fares for the citizens of Washington.

What has been the result? A commission has been created which is virtually a part of the street car companies. The commission do not represent the people of Washington but they represent the street car companies, and have used their place for the purpose of boosting street car fares up to the present enormous proportions of 8 cents for cash fares or 6 tokens for 40 cents.

I continue to quote from the article:

This was the answer given yesterday by the District Commissioners to the charge of Senators McKELLAR and CARAWAY that the District Utilities Commission had decreed rates exceeding those fixed for street car fares in the charters granted by Congress to the companies.

Here is what they say to us now, "You passed a law giving us this power, and we have used the power for the benefit of the street car companies. What are you going to do about it?" They defy us; they say to us, "It is true that there is a contract between the Government and the street car companies fixing fares of 5 cents, or six tickets for a quarter, but the Congress itself gave us the power to increase fares, which we have exercised, and that is a bar to any interference with us at this time." They virtually tell us we have not the power to interfere with their actions in exploiting the people for the benefit of the street car companies.

I quote further from the statement of the commissioners:

Coupled with this statement was the declaration that the commissioners would willingly resign and leave to others the task of acting as the Public Utilities Commission of the District.

That is the best thing that I have heard in some time. Of course they ought to resign; these men have no business in that place; they owe it to themselves to resign; they owe it to the public to resign; they are being used, whether they know it or not, as tools of the street car companies. In making this statement I am saying it in an impersonal manner, for I do not know a single member of the Board of Commissioners personally and I do not even know the name of any member of the board, but I know what their acts have been, and I am judging them by their acts. Their acts have been to raise the street car fares inordinately in this city, and they ought to resign. I think they know that they ought to resign. Nobody had said anything about their resigning before, and yet when this matter is brought to the attention of the public the first thing they say is that they are willing to resign. Why, of course they should resign. Their resignations ought to be handed in at once, and the Congress, in order to make it absolutely certain, ought to abolish the commission.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President—

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. DIAL. I should like to ask the Senator, for information, when was the contract changed and how long was it in existence?

Mr. McKELLAR. This contract has been in existence in the case of one of the companies since 1900, and in the case of the other since about that time. I do not remember just exactly the date. It remained that way until 1913, when the Public Utilities Commission were given certain powers. They never exercised the power of changing rates at first, and then it was thought and then it was argued that they would lower the rates of fare, not increase them; but when the war came on they used this power during the war to increase the fares, and they are still increased. In the case of anyone going to his or her work every day, there is an additional charge which amounts to $1.50 a month. It is a tax upon the plain people of this community that ought not to be longer tolerated.

Mr. DIAL. The Senator means $1.50 over the original fare?

Mr. McKELLAR. One dollar and a half over the contract fare.

The commissioners added they would welcome any means whereby rates could be cut and a fair return still be assured.

What do they call a fair return? Is not 13 per cent a fair return on stock much of which is water? If they do not call that a fair return, I think the commission ought to be abolished for another reason which I will not express.

Mr. President, I am not going to take up further time about this matter. Every Senator understands it, I am sure. I certainly hope the Senate will adopt this amendment. It ought to be adopted in the interest of fairness, in the interest of justice, in the interest of fair play between the citizens of Washington. We ought not to permit these corporations to prey upon the people as the Public Utilities Commission now permits them to prey upon the people of Washington. It is entirely unjust. It is unconscionable. I am told that the president of one of these companies draws $18,000 a year salary. Some say it has recently been raised to $30,000. If we are going to legislate just for the benefit of the rich and powerful, let us go ahead and let the Utilities Commission and the street car companies continue to prey upon the people; but it does seem to me that we might think occasionally of those who have to work daily for their bread and to whom $1.50 a month amounts to a good deal in this life.

Mr. President, my amendment, which I hope will be adopted, is as follows:

Provided, That the appropriation in this section shall not become available until the Public Utilities Commission shall fix rates of fare for the street railway companies in the District of Columbia at rates not in excess of the rates of fare fixed in existing charters or contracts heretofore entered into between said companies and the Congress.

Mr. McKELLAR subsequently said: Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks, the reports of the two traction companies of the District of Columbia as published in the newspapers, to which reports I referred this morning.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The reports referred to are as follows:

[Report of the condition of the traction company as published in the Washington Star January 11, 1923.]

CAPITAL TRACTION ELECTS OFFICERS—ANNUAL REPORT SHOWS PROFIT AND LOSS BALANCE OF $264,981.39 OVER 1921.

The Capital Traction Co. at its annual stockholders' meeting to-day reelected its old board of directors to serve for the ensuing year. It is composed of George E. Hamilton, E. J. Stellwagen, John S. Larcombe, David S. Carl, Benjamin W. Guy, John M. Perry, and John H. Hanna. Organization followed immediately and the company's old officers were reelected and include George E. Hamilton, president; David S. Carl, vice president; John H. Hanna, vice president; Henry D. Crampton, secretary-treasurer; J. E. Heberle, assistant secretary; and C. B. Koontz, assistant treasurer.

A summary of operations for the year ending December 31, 1922, was read with the company's annual report, and showed a dropping off in total revenue from transportation of $506,673.28 over the same period in 1921, there being a decrease in passenger revenue of $506,583.28 and a loss in special-car service of $90.

OPERATING REVENUE DROPS.

There was also a decrease in revenue from operation other than transportation of $483.08 as compared with 1921, which, with revenue for same during 1922, made the total railway operating revenue $4,994,043.99, or a total decrease over 1921 of $507,156.36.

The company's operating expenses (62.979 per cent of gross revenue), which totaled $3,167,211.14, also showed a decrease over 1921 of $53,529.75, leaving net operating revenue of $1,826,832.85, or a total decrease for same over 1921 of $453,626.61.

Deduction of taxes assignable to railway operation of $436,093.45, which was a decrease of $137,426.19, showed the company's operating income to be $1,390,739.45, or a decrease over 1921 of $316,200.42.

The nonoperating income of the company for 1922 was $34,906.34, which was an increase over 1921 of $16,494.84, which left a gross income for 1922 of $1,425,645.79, or a decrease over 1921 of $299,705.58.

The company's net income for 1922 after total deductions from gross income had been made amounted to $1,104,991.39, or a decrease over 1921 of $308,711.89, the total deductions of $320,654.40 being an increase over the same period in 1921 of $7,003.31.

The company's profit and loss balance at the end of the year just closed was $1,354,567.24, or an increase over 1921 of $261,981.39.

[Statement as to the earnings of the Washington Railway & Electric Co. as published in the Washington Star on January 20, 1923.]

W. R. E. ORDERS 20 PAY-WITHIN CARS.

Thirty new cars of the most modern pay-within type have been ordered by the Washington Railway & Electric Co. for delivery early this year. William F. Ham, president, told the directors and stockholders in his annual report to-day. The company a few weeks ago ordered 10 more one-man cars, making a total of 40 that will be added to the company's rolling stock during 1923.

The president's report on the finances of the company shows a balance of $414,818.31 credited to profit and loss from 1922 operations. Here is a summary of the financial statement:

Gross earnings from operation, $5,022,966.84; miscellaneous income, including dividends from the Potomac Electric Power Co., $690,226.39. These two figures added give gross income of $5,713,193.23.

$4,100,059 OPERATING COSTS.

Operating expenses, including depreciation, taxes, and miscellaneous charges, $4,100,059.80; interest on funded and unfunded debt, $764,315.12; payment of 5 per cent dividend on preferred stock, $425,000, making a total of $5,298,374.92. The difference between these two totals gives the profit and loss balance of $414,818.31.

Mr. Ham says the company expects to have a total of 70 one-man cars in operation this year and that they will result in annual saving of $150,000 in operating expenses. He states that this, "in the final analysis, redounds to the benefit of the car rider, as reflected in the rate of fare."

The Potomac Electric Power Co., owned by the Washington Railway & Electric Co., continued to grow during 1922, taking on 8,889 new customers, making a total of 63,775. In 1901 the power company had only 2,953 users of electricity.

The output of the Benning power plant for the year was 251,979,077 kilowatt hours, an increase of 13,955,394 over the preceding 12 months. The Washington Railway & Electric Co. carried a total of 107,009,948 passengers during the year, of whom 24,893,192 were carried on transfers. This left 82,716,756 revenue passengers last year, as compared with 85,481,656 in 1921.

This was a falling off of 3.22 per cent compared with the preceding year. Mr. Ham says that while this was a serious falling off, it was to be expected as a result of the gradual reduction in the number of Government employees in Washington.

Discussing its venture into the motor-bus business during 1922 the president said:

"While we believe that busses can not in any way supplant service by street cars, there is, in our opinion, a considerable field of usefulness for the bus in conjunction with a street-car system." Mr. Ham told the directors that fully 55 per cent of all street-car accidents are collisions with automobiles, while less than 4 per cent of the year's accidents involved pedestrians. The company continued its safety contest to make its trainmen more efficient in keeping down accidents.

It was expected to-day that only one new man—Edwin Gruhl, of New York—would be elected to the board of directors for the ensuing year. He would succeed Harold B. Thorne, who is retiring from the board.

It also was expected that the present staff of officers would be reelected.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I have had no opportunity to learn anything of the merits or the demerits of the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR]; so, therefore, I shall not indulge in any comment whatsoever about it. I know nothing about the rights or wrongs of the situation which he has described, except as I have heard him mention them this morning; but, Mr. President, if I may say so, I am very much disturbed at the situation which will result in the Senate in the future in connection with appropriation bills if amendments of this sort are deemed to be in order.

On a former occasion an amendment similar to this was offered by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], and the then occupant of the Chair, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], held that it was in order on the ground that it was a limitation upon an appropriation. The Vice President this morning has held this amendment in order, following, as I understood him to say, the precedent set by the former ruling, from which no appeal had been taken.

Mr. President, in my judgment the matter far transcends in importance this amendment. The admission of an amendment of this kind will establish a policy and a custom and a set rule of the Senate which, in my humble judgment, will permit legislation upon appropriation bills without any limit whatsoever, for by merely resorting to the device of saying "The appropriation in this section shall not become available until a certain set of public officers do or perform a certain administrative act," and asserting that that is a limitation upon appropriations, with which I can not agree, there is no limit to the amount of legislation which can be put upon an appropriation bill.

With the greatest respect, Mr. President, I contend that this amendment does not limit the appropriation. It places no restrictions or limitations upon the use of the money. It simply says that the money shall not be used at all until an act is performed in accordance with the will of Congress; and when Congress imposes its will or seeks to impose its will upon administrative officers in directing them to do a certain thing it is legislating. This is legislation. We are in effect directing the Public Utilities Commissioners to regulate the street-car fares of the District of Columbia. We are not directing them to use this money in a certain way. We are not restricting them in the use of the money in any way whatsoever. We are simply saying to them, "You shall not have this money unless you follow out our legislative mandate." That is legislation, Mr. President.

If amendments of this kind are in order on all kinds of appropriation bills, we will find ourselves constantly confronted with situations like this, in which an amendment may be offered, we will say, to the naval appropriation bill to the effect that the moneys sought to be appropriated for the office of the Secretary of the Navy shall not be available until the Secretary of the Navy retires naval officers at a higher pay, or a lower pay, or at no pay at all; and it will be contended, if this thing stands to-day, that that is a limitation upon the appropriation for the Navy Department. My contention is that that, just as this, is not a limitation upon the use of the appropriations but is legislation, pure and simple. It will be in order hereafter, when the Army appropriation bill is before the Senate, for an amendment to be offered and to be considered and voted on to the effect that none of the money appropriated for the Quartermaster Corps shall become available until the quartermaster doubles or halves the amount of rations supplied to troops. It is exactly the same principle that is involved in this amendment. There will be no limit to the legislation that can be put through and attached to appropriation bills; and it is with the greatest respect, Mr. President, that I call up this matter at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair supposes the Senator is familiar with the fact that exactly this principle has been applied to the naval bill, and it was ruled in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there was no appeal at that time; and that is the danger of a decision of the Chair when the question involved does not seem to amount to anything. I think, as the Senator from New York has well stated, that this is the most dangerous thing that can possibly occur in the passage of appropriation bills for the future, if the point of order is sustained.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I had not concluded. May I call the President's attention to the last sentence of this amendment, which reads as follows:

And, on and after February 1, 1923, said companies shall receive a rate of fare not exceeding 5 cents per passenger, and six tickets shall be sold for 25 cents.

That has nothing to do with limiting an appropriation. That is legislation—nothing but legislation.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is existing law.

Mr. WADSWORTH. If it is existing law, why repeat it in an amendment? But, aside from that, Mr. President, the body of this amendment has no effect whatsoever except in the way of legislating.

I am well aware, as the Vice President has said, that a precedent has already been set. I knew of one occasion, the occasion which I have referred to, and the Vice President has reminded me of another occasion, which I understand occurred in connection with the naval appropriation bill. I believe the precedents are bad and dangerous; for, as I said a moment ago, there can be no limit whatsoever hereafter on the amount of legislation which can be attached to appropriation bills upon the floor of the Senate if a rule of this kind is finally determined to be the rule of the Senate.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator from Tennessee said that the last part of this amendment was existing law. That clearly is not so—

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not see how it could be.

Mr. LENROOT. Because existing law does not require a 5-cent fare.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, yes; it does.

Mr. LENROOT. No; the Senator is mistaken there.

Mr. McKELLAR. There is an act of Congress with reference to it.

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, but discretion is vested in the Utilities Commission to change that rate of fare; and when changed it becomes law, as much as if directly enacted by Congress.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator whether he is arguing the merits of the proposition now? I thought a ruling had been made.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Not the merits of the amendment at all; I am arguing the merits of the ruling.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator has a right to appeal from the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am going to, if the Senator will give me an opportunity. Mr. President, it is with the greatest respect to you, sir, that I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the ruling of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I think Senators are apt, in the too close contemplation of the niceties of the law, to lose contemplation of the soul of the law itself. It is a very precious memory for me that all the immunities amongst these English-speaking people of the world have been attained by legislating upon appropriation bills, and by saying to kings and to lords: "When we grant you supplies, we grant you them upon condition that you use them as we say, and not otherwise."

I am not arguing from that that our special rules are not to a certain extent in conflict with that old principle; but I want Senators to remember that there never would have been any parliamentary and political and financial liberty amongst English-speaking peoples except from the use of the power of the purse by the legislative bodies of all countries, and therefore, Mr. President—and this is the point, and the only point, I want to make—that any rule of either body interfering with that principle ought to be strictly construed, and wherever there be a doubt in the mind of the Presiding Officer it ought to be decided in favor of the fundamental principle, and not in favor of the extension or too strict exercise of the power granted under the rule itself.

I would not like to see the day come when we could not do about what the Senator from New York referred to a moment ago, in an antagonistic spirit, put a limitation upon the use of money by a board possessing discretionary power. We give this commission the discretionary power. We have, therefore, a right to interfere now and then, to modify, limit, or qualify, and notwithstanding the fact that there may be a technical rule which might, by its very strict enforcement, interfere with that, that rule ought not to be invoked except for the purpose of maintaining some human or natural right.

The great soul of it all, behind it all, is the right of a legislative body, following in the footsteps of the House of Commons, and of all of our colonial assemblies when we were fighting taxation from abroad, to couple every general supply for the Government with a condition, so that the legislative body could control the servants of the country, the members of the executive in subordinate positions. So I would ask, while Senators are calling attention to the danger of too lax enforcement of these rules, that they should remember the danger to human liberty itself from the too strict enforcement of these rules.

As far as I myself am concerned, I never voted for a rule to deprive the legislative branch of the Government of the power to put new legislation on appropriation bills. I confess the rules that there adopted, however, do do that, but I do not believe they were wise when they were adopted, and I do not believe the too strict enforcement of them is ever advisable.

In the House this argument could not be made very well, but I believe it has become a maxim in the Senate that when the Senate votes upon an appeal from a decision of the Chair, it is voting not so much upon strict parliamentary law, as upon its idea of what ought to happen in the particular case presented before them for consideration and determination.

I hope that Senators will not forget the very soul of the Government, and make a petty rule of the Senate at any time superior to a fundamental principle whereby in the past all progress of liberty has been made, and whereon in the future to a larger extent than Senators may think now, the hope of further progress is based.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I believe I have the right to perfect my amendment, and I therefore ask permission to strike out all of line 6 after the word "Congress," and all of lines 7, 8, and 9, thereby perfecting the amendment.

Mr. ASHURST. Of course, the Senator has that right.

The VICE PRESIDENT. After having been considered and a decision upon a point of order, the amendment can only be modified by the mover by unanimous consent.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent that I may perfect my amendment in that way.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. SMOOT. I would like to have the change in the amendment stated.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is simply to strike out everything after the word "Congress," in line 6.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The secretary will state the modification of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. It is to strike from the proposed amendment the following words: "And on and after February 1, 1923, said companies shall receive a rate of fare not exceeding 5 cents per passenger, and six tickets shall be sold for 25 cents," so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That the appropriation in this section shall not become available until the Public Utilities Commission shall fix rates of fare for the street railway companies in the District of Columbia at rates not in excess of the rates of fare fixed in existing charters or contracts heretofore entered into between said companies and the Congress.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I first discuss the ruling of the Chair, which, in my judgment, is correct. I do not recall, in my experience here, ever having seen two situations more completely on all fours, as lawyers say, than those presented by the precedent just cited and the recent ruling of the Chair. Indeed, so completely on all fours are they that the Senator who made the point of order when the precedent was set is the same Senator who makes the point of order now.

The able Senator from New York, for whose judgment on parliamentary questions I have respect, complains that no appeal was taken when the precedent was set. Did he expect that we who were in favor of the ruling should have appealed? If no appeal was then taken, the laches, the fault, the defect, and the delay is at the door of those who are now complaining of the ruling.

As to the merits of the amendment; this is the Federal city. We are here to make laws for the people of the United States. Lawmakers, department heads, bureau chiefs, copyists, stenographers, messengers, and others come here to do the work of a nation. They ask no special privilege; but it occurs to me that in the Federal city, whither we are sent to make laws for the people and to administer the departments of Government, we at least ought not to be exploited. In no other city in America are the plain people so exploited as they are here. They are charged exorbitant rates for gas, they are charged exorbitant rates for electric-light current, they are charged exorbitant rates for telephone service and high rates for street-car fares, whilst the long teeth of the rent profiteer puncture the flesh of even the poor clerks who come here to serve this Government.

In addition to that the people here are helpless, powerless, with no vote, no voice, in choosing those who set these rates. It is not fair, it is not decent, for us to sit here and permit such an exploitation of the people's servants as is carried on in this District.

Nay, more; not only are the people's servants exploited here in the matter of gas, electric-light, telephone, and street-car service, and rents, but if they walk the streets they are not safe, because, as was said the other day in this Chamber, no person is safe in the streets of Washington, but is constantly in peril of death or serious injury by a rapidly moving automobile.

I hope the amendment will be agreed to. From the figures submitted by the Senator from Tennessee, he claims that the net annual revenue of the stockholders is 7 per cent on their investment.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Capital Traction Co. paid 7 per cent dividends and have a remaining surplus of $1,354,567. They could have paid 12 or 13 per cent.

Mr. ASHURST. Moreover, Mr. President, it will be remembered that on many of these street-car lines no transfers are granted. The poor employees of the Government are the ones who must pay high rates. Most Senators have their own automobiles. They do not worry about the $1.50 a month excess fare which 8 cents per transit means to the clerk. We should require transfers on all lines and should condemn and sell the auto of the reckless driver who runs down persons on the street. There is a psychology about the driver of cars. Many speed-mad persons while driving cars are seized with the idea that pedestrians have no rights. The speed-mad man will risk his family, but he will never risk his car. If when he runs some one down his car were sold at public auction, he will run down no more people, because the ordinary speed-bug maniac would risk the life of his wife before he would risk his car.

I have just been advised that the debate on this bill must stop within five minutes. I feel, therefore, that I ought to yield the floor to some one who might want to make some reply, and if there can be a reply to the remarks I have made I would like to hear it. I yield the floor.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, with reference to the amendment as now modified, I think it might be admitted that technically, according to the precedents, it is a limitation; but the letter killeth and the spirit maketh alive. What is the natural, the conclusive construction of it? The Public Utilities Commission is now vested by law with discretion to do certain things, among them to fix rates, not at their own will, not at their own absolute discretion, but according to rules of law.

The amendment proposes that the salaries of the members of that commission, which are a liability against the Government, which must be paid by the Government, shall not be paid unless the commission does certain things which, if it is conscientious in the performance of duty, it may find it has no power to do at all. It presents a very different question from that raised where general discretion lies in some administrative officer of the Government to use an appropriation for this purpose or that purpose or the other purpose, where a limitation is put in to the effect that the appropriation shall not be used for such and such purpose unless something is done that the officer has discretion, under the law, to do. In this case the commission has no such discretion. It is governed by the law, and this is an expression to the commission to this effect, "You must not observe the rules of law. We will not pay your salaries if you do." In effect it is not only a repeal of existing law but clearly is legislation, attempting to deny to the commission, under the penalty of having the salaries of the members withheld, the right to perform its duties under the law.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to modifying the amendment? The Chair hears none.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I move to lay the appeal from the decision of the Chair on the table.

Mr. SMOOT. Let us have a direct vote on the appeal. Why not vote directly on it now?

Mr. ASHURST. Very well; I withdraw my motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. HARRISON and Mr. CARAWAY called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HARRISON (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] to the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] and vote "yea."

Mr. KELLOGG (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] to the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] and vote "nay."

Mr. LODGE (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] to the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] and vote "nay."

Mr. MCKELLAR (when Mr. OVERMAN's name was called). The junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] is detained from the Senate by illness. He is paired with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN].

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] to the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. ERNST (after having voted in the negative). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] to the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. WILLIS (after having voted in the negative). Has the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. WILLIS. I am paired with the senior Senator from Ohio. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. WELLER] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. CURTIS. I was requested to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN]; and

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD].

The result was announced—yeas 32, nays 36, as follows:

The VICE PRESIDENT. The decision of the Chair is overruled, and the Senate holds the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] not to be in order.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. For what purpose does the Senator rise?

Mr. HEFLIN. To discuss the bill and comment upon the vote just taken.

The VICE PRESIDENT. All debate ceased at 1 o'clock.

Mr. HEFLIN. That is a new proposition to me.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will read the unanimous-consent agreement entered into yesterday:

It is agreed, by unanimous consent, that when the Senate concludes its business to-day it will take a recess until 12 o'clock meridian, calendar day of Thursday, January 25, 1923, and that at not later than 1 o'clock p. m. on said calendar day all debate shall cease on the bill H. R. 13660 and all amendments offered thereto.

There is an amendment pending offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHELPS], on which the Senate has acted only in part. The Secretary will report the remainder of the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The amendment was divided. It had reference to the Klinge Valley Park, the Piney Branch Valley Park, and what is known as the Patterson tract. The Senate voted upon the Klinge Valley Park purchase and the Piney Branch Valley Park purchase and agreed thereto. Upon the remaining portion, that proposing to purchase the Patterson tract, there has been no vote.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the remainder of the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. All parts of the amendment having been agreed to, there is no further question on it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] offered an amendment. He has been called from the Chamber. In his absence I ask the Secretary to report the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 53, strike out lines 1 and 2, in the following words:

For the purchase of land for school purposes adjacent to the Langley Junior High School, $215,000.

And insert in lieu thereof the following:

For beginning the construction of a new McKinley Manual Training School on land now owned by the District of Columbia adjacent to the Macfarland Junior High School, $215,000, and the limit of cost of said McKinley Manual Training School is hereby fixed at $1,500,000.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. A number of amendments were passed over relating to motor vehicles, offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR].

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, I move to amend the bill on pages 17 and 18 by striking out the following words:

For purchase of two new automobiles for use of the various departments of the government of the District of Columbia, and for the exchange of such automobiles now owned by the District of Columbia as, in the judgment of the commissioners of said District, have or shall become unserviceable, $4,000.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under the agreement, the committee amendments are first to be considered. The Secretary will state in their order the committee amendments which have been passed over.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The first committee amendment passed over is on page 33, where it is proposed to insert, in line 20, after the word "vehicles," the words "or motor vehicles," and on the same page, line 23, after the word "vehicles," to insert "$26 per month for an automobile and $13 per month for a motor cycle."

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, according to my recollection, it was agreed that the amendments of the committee relating to automobiles and motor cycles in various places in the bill should be treated as a whole and considered en bloc.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is correct.

Mr. PHIPPS. As I understand, the question would come on the adoption of the committee amendment striking out certain language of the House text found on pages 16 and 17 of the bill.

However, Mr. President, I understand that, under the unanimous-consent agreement, debate is not in order. I had overlooked that for the moment. I was merely endeavoring to explain the situation.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think the Senator has a perfect right, under the unanimous-consent agreement, to say what he has said.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the several amendments reported by the committee relating to motor vehicles, which have been passed over and which will be voted on en bloc.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Assistant Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ERNST (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before with reference to my pair and its transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. HARRISON (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the preceding vote concerning my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. KELLOGG (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and transfer as on the preceding vote, I vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIS (when his name was called). I am paired with my colleague, the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], who is absent on account of illness. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. WELLER] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. LODGE. Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as on the preceding vote, I vote "yea."

Mr. FERNALD (after having voted in the affirmative). I inquire if the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. FERNALD. I have a pair with that Senator, which I transfer to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] and let my vote stand.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN];

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND] with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]; and

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD].

The result was announced—yeas 41, nays 20, as follows:

YEAS—41.

Ball	Hale	McKinley
Bursum	Harrell	McLean
Calder	Johnson	McNary
Cameron	Jones, Wash.	New

So the amendments reported by the committee which had been passed over were agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

INVESTIGATION OF MEMBERSHIP IN FEDERAL RESERVE SYSTEM.

Mr. McLEAN. I ask unanimous consent to present a concurrent resolution and that it be read and lie upon the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The resolution (S. Con. Res. 33) was read, as follows:

Whereas the Federal reserve system was established by the Congress for the benefit of all sections of the country and of all agricultural as well as commercial and industrial interests; and

Whereas it appears from the last annual report of the Federal Reserve Board that 9,640 State banks and trust companies, constituting over 85 per cent of the eligible State banks and trust companies in the United States, have failed to become members of the Federal reserve system.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That a joint committee be appointed, to consist of three Members of the Senate, to be appointed by the President thereof, and three Members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker thereof. Vacancies occurring in the membership of the committee shall be filled in the same manner as the original appointment.

2. That said joint committee be authorized to inquire into the effect of the present limited membership of State banks and trust companies in the Federal reserve system upon financial conditions in the agricultural sections of the United States, the reasons which actuate eligible State banks and trust companies in failing to become members of the Federal reserve system, what administrative measures have been taken and are being taken to increase such membership, and whether or not any change should be made in existing law or in rules and regulations of the Federal Reserve Board or in methods of administration to bring about in the agricultural districts a larger membership of such banks or trust companies in the Federal reserve system.

3. That said committee be authorized to sit at any time during the sessions or recesses of the Congress and conduct its hearings at Washington or at any other place in the United States, to send for persons, books, and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ experts deemed necessary by such committee, a clerk and a stenographer to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be before said committee, such stenographer's service to be rendered at a cost not exceeding $1.25 per printed page; the expenses involved in carrying out this resolution to be paid in equal parts out of the contingent funds of the Senate and House of Representatives.

4. The committee shall from time to time report to both the Senate and House of Representatives the results of its inquiries, together with its recommendations, and may prepare and submit bills or resolutions embodying such recommendations, and the final report of said committee shall be submitted not later than January 31, 1924.

Mr. WARREN. I understand it is desired to have the concurrent resolution lie on the table.

Mr. HEFLIN. What was the request of the Senator from Connecticut regarding this resolution?

Mr. McLEAN. That it be printed and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That order will be made.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhues, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed without amendment the bill (S. 4309) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii,' approved April 30, 1900, as amended, to establish an Hawaiian homes commission, granting certain powers to the board of harbor commissioners of the Territory of Hawaii, and for other purposes," approved July 9, 1921.

The message also announced that the House insisted upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 7, 12, and 13 to the bill (H. R. 13593) making appropriations for the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes, agreed to the further conference requested by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. SLEMP, Mr. MADDEN, Mr. OGDEN, Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, and Mr. CARTER were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (S. J. Res. 247) authorizing the appropriation of funds for the maintenance of public order and the protection of life and property during the convention of the Imperial Council of the Mystic Shrine in the District of Columbia June 5, 6, and 7, 1923, and for other purposes, and it was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

INVESTIGATION OF GREAT LAKES-GULF OF MEXICO WATERWAY.

Mr. McCORMICK. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate Resolution 411, proposing to create a committee to investigate and report upon the problem for a 9-foot channel in the waterway from the Great Lakes to the Gulf of Mexico.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the Senate appoint a committee to consist of five Members of the Senate, three from the majority party and two from the minority party, to investigate the problem of a 9-foot channel in the waterway from the Great Lakes to the Gulf of Mexico. The committee shall make a final report of its investigations with recommendations to the Senate not later than May 1, 1924. For the purposes of this resolution the committee is authorized to sit and act at such times during the sessions or recesses of the Sixty-seventh and Sixty-eighth Congresses and in such places within the United States, to hold such hearings, and to employ a stenographer and such other assistance as may be necessary. The cost of stenographic service to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The committee is further authorized to send for persons, books, and papers, to administer oaths, and to take testimony. The expenses of the committee shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I ask that the unfinished business may be laid before the Senate.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12817) to amend and supplement the merchant marine act, 1920, and for other purposes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I ask that the unanimous-consent proposal that I had read to the Senate yesterday may be laid before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the unanimous-consent proposal.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I should like to have the Senator yield to me about five minutes before he does that.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I want to present this request first.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

The Senator from Washington asks unanimous consent that on and after the calendar day of Monday, January 29, 1923, no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than two hours upon the shipping bill, nor more than once or longer than 30 minutes upon any amendment offered thereto, and on and after the calendar day of Monday, the 5th day of February, 1923, unless the bill is already disposed of, no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 30 minutes on the bill, nor more than once or longer than 10 minutes on any amendment that may be offered thereto.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on entering into the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question? I did not catch just the terms of the proposal. Is it proposed to start Monday to limit debate?

Mr. JONES of Washington. To limit it to one speech of two hours on the bill and one speech of 30 minutes on each amendment; then, if the bill is not disposed of prior to February 5, that beginning on that date and thereafter the debate shall be limited to one speech of 30 minutes on the bill and one speech of 10 minutes on each amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. I have just heard it read for the first time. Does it provide that the bill shall be kept before the Senate all the time?

Mr. JONES of Washington. It does not.

Mr. HARRISON. Was it the intention of the Senator, if we could enter into that agreement, to keep it before the Senate all the time?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Not necessarily all the time, but as continuously as possible. Of course, if we had other business that we could take up by unanimous consent, it would be taken up.

Mr. HARRISON. Of course the Senator realizes that here are two very important appropriation bills, the legislative appropriation bill and the Army appropriation bill. I note in the case of the Army appropriation bill that an amendment has been proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] touching Muscle Shoals. Of course that will take up a great deal of time, because it is a very important question. It is a question that a great many of us think is just as important as the ship-subsidy proposition, so no doubt the Army bill will consume quite a good deal of time. The legislative appropriation bill will naturally take up some time, because there are some important items in it, and they should be considered, even though we should exert every opportunity to speed up and show haste, as no doubt we will. Then there is upon the calendar the agricultural credits bill, which has been before the Senate for some time, which the President has asked Congress to pass before we adjourn on the 4th of March. It is a bill that three or four groups of Senators, as well as committees, have had hearings upon for months, I may say for years, and it is recommended. It will take, no doubt, some time, because it ought to take time, it is such an important proposition. I should not be surprised if it would take at least a week, and we would have to show a great deal of speed if we should put the bill through in a week.

On yesterday the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry reported out the so-called Norbeck bill, providing for credits to sell to foreign countries goods produced in this country. That amendment, of course, if it is offered to the agricultural credits bill will provoke a good deal of controversy. It is a most important proposition. In my opinion it should be adopted. Others may disagree with me; but with all these bills that should be considered and passed by all means before we adjourn on the 4th of March, a little more than five weeks from now, it seems to me a little premature for the Senator at this time to want to limit debate on a ship-subsidy bill that we have hardly heard mentioned in five weeks. When they get ready to pass the ship-subsidy bill it would seem to me that there should be full consideration and full debate upon it, and it should be kept before the Senate.

I presume that the other side of the Chamber desires no extra session of Congress. The best way in the world to get an extra session of Congress is to delay these appropriation bills, and there is no disposition that I have seen on this side to delay any of them. On the contrary, we have tried to whip them through here, cooperating with the other side to do it. We intend to do it. We intend to do the same thing with the agricultural credits proposition; but it does seem that until we get those things out of the way the Senator should not prematurely ask for a unanimous-consent agreement to force through here a bill that has not yet been discussed in all its phases. The American people never would be satisfied with it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, there is nothing in this unanimous-consent agreement that would prevent ample discussion of the shipping bill. In two hours, I think, any Senator can state his views of the general principle involved, and then on every amendment proposed each Senator would have 30 minutes for debate. Of course what I want to do is to expedite the passage of the bills to which the Senator has referred. I should be perfectly willing to shorten the time of speeches on the shipping bill. That would hasten action upon all these measures that the Senator has suggested; but I present this proposal for unanimous consent. Of course one objection will prevent it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to entering into the proposed unanimous-consent agreement?

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Washington about a suggestion I see in the morning paper with reference to this unanimous-consent agreement. It says:

This suggestion for a modified cloture, which could be obtained only by unanimous consent, was obviously yesterday's answer to the demand of the previous day of the United States Chamber of Commerce that the Senate bring this bill to a vote.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I will say frankly to the Senator that I had not read what the National Chamber of Commerce had requested. My relations with the National Chamber of Commerce of the United States are not of the most friendly character. I have criticized them very severely in some instances in the past, and I want to say that their request had absolutely nothing to do with this proposal. I submitted this proposal, or something like it, a few days ago; but whether it was presented in response to that or not would have nothing to do with the merits of it. I will say, however, that in this case if it had had any influence at all it would have influenced me against presenting it.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I am glad to know that the United States Chamber of Commerce had no direct influence with the Senator, and I do not doubt his statement in the least, but believe every word of it; but, in order to make absolutely sure that the voice of the people of the United States, which decreed that this debate should end on the 4th of March, shall be effective, I shall object to this unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I should like to suggest, in connection with the request for unanimous consent, that there are a number of Senators who have not yet had an opportunity to be heard on the ship-subsidy bill at all. It would be unfair to them to agree now that their time should be limited, and therefore I think the request of the Senator is premature. When we get to that bill again it may be in order.

RURAL-CREDIT FACILITIES.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 4287, Order of Business No. 979.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Senator from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill, the title of which will be stated by the Secretary.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. A bill (S. 4287) to provide credit facilities for the agricultural and live-stock industries of the United States; to amend the Federal farm loan act; to amend the Federal reserve act; and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency with an amendment.

Mr. LENROOT obtained the floor.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President—

Mr. LENROOT. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

FIVE-CENT STREET-CAR FARES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, a moment ago the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] was pending, which provided for 5-cent street-car fares in the city of Washington. The Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] made a point of order against that amendment, and the Chair ruled that the amendment was in order, that the Senate had a right to vote upon the proposition as to whether or not the people of Washington who travel on these street cars should be relieved from the burden of an 8-cent fare. The Chair ruled properly upon that question; but the Senator from New York insisted that his point of order was good and appealed from the decision of the Chair, and the Republican Members of this body overturned the ruling of a Republican Vice President in order to deny the people of Washington and the people of the United States who come to Washington and travel on these street cars the right to enjoy a 5-cent fare.

The Democratic mayor of the city of New York conducted for quite a time a fight in favor of 5-cent fares. He finally succeeded, and now any citizen of the United States can go to the city of New York and ride all over it for 5 cents; but the Senator from New York and his colleague both voted here to deny the Senate the right even to vote upon the question as to whether or not the people in the District of Columbia shall enjoy a 5-cent fare.

I know that those who own stock in these street-car companies in the city of Washington have done what they could to keep the measure from coming to a vote, feeling that if it ever reached a vote in this body there would be enough fair-minded men in it to vote for 5-cent fares, and have used their influence no doubt to prevent a vote ever being reached, and the Senate has been denied the right to vote upon that question. The people of the District of Columbia, going to and from their work with snow and sleet upon the ground, many of them receiving a very meager wage, must pay 16 cents a day for car fare, and must continue to pay it, when the Senate stood ready this morning, I believe, upon a straight vote on the issue to give them a 5-cent fare and save to their slender purses 6 cents a day. That would amount to something to them, Mr. President. Many people have to travel on these cars many times a day. It means 8 cents every time they ride upon the car, if they pay straight fare. Poor children going to school, as my friend the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL] suggests, must pay it.

I find, in looking over the roll call, that this amendment providing for 5-cent fares was defeated by lame-duck Senators. Six Senators who are going out voted to deny the people of the District of Columbia a 5-cent fare. The vote stood 32 to 36, and 6 who voted to deny the people of the District 5-cent fares were men who were defeated at the last election.

I do not believe such a motion would be defeated in any State in the Union, if you should go to the judgment bar of the people with this question, and ask them if they did not believe the people of the District of Columbia were entitled to ride for 5-cent fares, just as are the people of the city of New York entitled to ride for 5-cent fares. Both Senators from the State of New York voted to deny the people of the District of Columbia the privilege and opportunity of riding for 5-cent fares, when the people of the great metropolis of the East, the city of New York, enjoy the privilege of riding for 5-cent fares.

That reform up there in New York, however, was brought about under the leadership of the Democratic mayor of that city, which is another evidence of the fact that all measures which seek to do justice to the common man and woman, which look to the welfare of the masses of the people, which try to bring about conditions which are fair and just to them, are always inaugurated by Democrats. Any measure that seeks to protect the special interests is always supported by the dominant force of the Republican Party rallying to it and fighting for it. That is the plain truth and history of the situation involved here to-day.

I simply wanted to make that comment. The Vice President ruled correctly. The idea of saying to the Congress of the United States, when these corporations are gouging the people of the District of Columbia out of 8-cent fares every time they ride upon the street cars, "You have that intolerable condition upon you, and you can not get it off." It is simply ridiculous.

Who created the law that permitted it? A Republican Congress, did it not? How are you going to get out from under? If Congress can not do it, who can do it? Are you going to say that nobody, unless these who, like leeches, suck the lifeblood of thousands of the poor traveling public in this District, consent to have it done? That is the meaning of the vote this morning turning down the Vice President's ruling.

I simply wanted the RECORD to show that somebody protested against that act, and that somebody on the Democratic side lifted his voice in support of the Senator from Tennessee and those who joined with him on this side to have that 5-cent fare amendment adopted. I want to mention this fact, that not a Republican in the Senate, I believe, voted for the 5-cent fare, except the progressive Republicans, who really belong in the Democratic Party.

RURAL CREDIT FACILITIES.

The Senate, as in the Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 4287) to provide credit facilities for the agricultural and live-stock industries of the United States; to amend the Federal farm loan act; to amend the Federal reserve act; and for other purposes.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, the pending measure is one introduced by the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] regarding farm and rural credits. I am very anxious to hear him; I know many other Senators are very desirous of hearing the Senator deliver his able and clarifying address on this subject, and I make the point of no quorum, so that Senators may have an opportunity to hear the Senator on this very interesting question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WILLIS in the chair). The Senator from Virginia suggests the absence of a quorum, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Assistant Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	George	Lodge	Robinson
Ball	Glass	McCormick	Sheppard
Bayard	Hale	McCumber	Shortridge
Borah	Harris	McKellar	Smith
Brookhart	Harrison	McKinley	Smoot
Calder	Hefflin	McLean	Stanfield
Cameron	Hitchcock	McNary	Sterling
Capper	Johnson	Nelson	Swanson
Caraway	Jones, Wash.	New	Wadsworth
Couzens	Kellogg	Norbeck	Walsh, Mont.
Culberson	Kendrick	Norris	Warren
Curtis	Keyes	Oddie	Watson
Dial	King	Pepper	Willis
Ernst	Ladd	Phipps
Fletcher	La Follette	Poinsett
Frelinghuysen	Lenroot	Ransdell

Mr. SWANSON. I desire to state that the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] is detained at his home in North Carolina on account of illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the week.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-one Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. LENROOT. I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wisconsin? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. FLETCHER. Did the Senator's request include the consideration of the committee amendments first?

Mr. LENROOT. There is only one amendment, so I will not insist upon that.

Mr. FLETCHER. Very well.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, before proceeding to a discussion of this bill, I want to say just one word with reference to the tirade of my friend from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] upon the action of the majority this morning in voting that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] was not in order. The Senator from Alabama very truly said that if the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee had been adopted, it would have had the effect of legislating a 5-cent fare in the District of Columbia, if I correctly understood him. That was exactly the position the majority on this side took with reference to that amendment. My position with reference to it was that it was legislation, that it did seek to have Congress fix the rate of fare in the District of Columbia.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WILLIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly.

Mr. McKELLAR. Am I to understand the Senator to say that he is not in favor of a 5-cent fare in the District of Columbia?

Mr. LENROOT. I am in favor of a 5-cent fare if a 5-cent fare can constitutionally be imposed in the District of Columbia, but the Senator from Tennessee does not know nor do I know whether that can be done.

Mr. President, the only point I wish to make is that the entire speech of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] sustained the position taken by the majority, because we have a rule in this body that legislation can not be placed upon an appropriation bill. That is all I care to say with reference to it. The Senator from Alabama in his speech fully sustained, although he did not realize it, the position taken by the majority.

Mr. President, with reference now to the pending bill I desire, if I may, to make a general statement concerning it, without interruption. When I come to the details of the bill I shall be very glad to answer any questions that may be proposed.

A few days ago the Senate passed what is known as the Capper bill, a bill in some quarters at least which is very generally misunderstood as to its purpose and effect. I am afraid that in some quarters there has been a deliberate purpose to misrepresent the bill to the country. The Capper bill did not pretend and does not purport to afford for the agricultural interests of the country the credit facilities they are entitled to have.

It was recognized by the Senator who introduced the bill [Mr. CAPPER], it was recognized by the members of the committee, and I think it was recognized by every Member of the Senate that practically the only effect of the Capper bill would be to enable the large live-stock interests of the country to get better credit facilities through the organization of corporations with a minimum capital of $250,000 under Federal supervision. The sole point of the measure was to create greater confidence in the private corporations by reason of Federal supervision—nothing more.

So far as the Middle West is concerned, so far as the South is concerned, it was not claimed that the average farmer of the country would be able to take advantage of the provisions of the Capper bill and form or secure the formation of the corporations which are permitted or provided for in that measure. And, yet, we find in some newspapers the claim that the Capper bill is all the credit legislation that the agricultural interests of the country need expect from Congress. Why, Mr. President, if I had thought that the Capper bill was the only agricultural legislation with reference to the subject of credits that was to be enacted at this session, I would have been very strongly disposed to oppose it, because there was only one interest, and that the largest live-stock interest in the country, that could be served by that bill, and because if discrimination is to be made those interests with large resources are better able to take care of themselves than is the average farmer.

Mr. STANFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair desires to remind the Senator from Oregon that the Senator from Wisconsin asked not to be interrupted.

Mr. LENROOT. I will stop for a question, yet I would like to repeat the request. I am aware that the Senator from Oregon took the position that the Capper bill would not even serve the interests I speak of.

Mr. STANFIELD. The Capper bill does not liberalize credits. It simply restricts credits to the idea of making them more accessible to bankers buying live-stock paper.

Mr. LENROOT. I am aware that is the position of the Senator from Oregon. The only point I wish to make in connection with the Capper bill is that it does not serve nor does it pretend to serve the needs of the average farmer of the United States. It will be helpful, I hope, to the large live-stock interests of the United States in the way of Federal supervision of the corporations.

Now, Mr. President, what is the need for any agricultural legislation affording greater facilities for credit to the farmers of the United States? There are two kinds of credit that we now have in the country, both of them available to a greater or less extent to the farmers. One is usually known as commercial credit, which is taken care of by the Federal reserve system and the State banks of the country. That credit is limited under our Federal reserve law, so far as members of the Federal reserve system are concerned, to three and six months' paper. We have our Federal land bank system, which provides for credit based upon real security, with long-time loans.

But there is a gap in between, running from six months to three years, as to which there is no credit facility at all, so far as any governmental agency is concerned. That credit facility, a credit facility running from six months to three years, is just as necessary for the farmers of the country as is a three months' or six months' credit to the merchants and commercial interests of the country. The merchants or the commercial interests have their short-time credits based upon the probable turnover of their business, and that is what originally determined the length of the paper; but the turnover of the farmers can not be secured in six months; it can not, except so far as marketing is concerned, and that only to a limited degree, be secured in nine months, as is provided by an amendment to the Federal reserve act extending the eligibility of agricultural paper for discount from six months to nine months. The farmers' turnover runs anywhere from nine months to three years.

The farmer, if he borrows money, we will say, to prepare his crop, can not pay off that indebtedness until he receives the proceeds of that crop. That very rarely is less than nine months—yes, it is very rarely less than a year, and in the case of live stock and dairying it is very often as long as three years.

There is no such facility to-day for the farmer. If he goes to the bank and attempts to borrow money to plant his crop, the bank will give him a credit for not exceeding six months. The farmer in securing that credit takes the chance, because he does not know but before the end of that six months, before he has realized at all upon the proceeds of his crop, that the bank may call upon him to repay his loan and he will have nothing with which to pay it.

Now the farmers of the country do not seek to become objects of charity. They do not ask, as some bills provide, that the Federal Treasury shall be opened to an unlimited extent to furnish credit for them; but they do ask, and they have the right to ask, that they shall be treated as other business men are treated, and that the farming business of the country shall be treated as a business and be put upon a business basis. They ask, and they have the right to ask, that they have such credit facilities that where they are of the same financial responsibility, of the same industry and of the same character as a merchant, they shall be entitled to the same kind of credit that the merchant receives. That they do not have to-day, and that is what the pending bill is designed to secure for them.

Mr. President, the origin of the bill now before the Senate is familiar to most Senators. In June, 1921, a joint resolution was passed by both Houses creating what was known as the Joint Commission of Agricultural Inquiry, with certain directions to the commission, among them being an "investigation into the banking and financial resources and credits of the country, especially as affecting agricultural credits." The commission spent nearly a year in the investigation of practically every phase of the agricultural problem. On the commission there were from the Senate Messrs. CAPPER, McNARY, ROBINSON, HARRISON, and myself. From the House side there were Messrs. ANDERSON, OGDEN, MILLS, FUNK, of Illinois, SUMNER of Texas, and TEN EYCK, of New York.

The commission made a most thorough and comprehensive investigation. I doubt if there was ever conducted by any committee or commission of Congress a more thorough investigation of the subject of agriculture generally than was conducted by that commission.

The results of its investigation were embodied in four separate reports. One of them dealt solely with the question of credits. The report is available to every Senator, if he has not already had it. One of the principal recommendations of the commission was the creation of a system of intermediate credits, such as I have been describing. As a result of the investigation made by the commission there was recommended to both Houses of Congress the enactment of a law substantially such as contemplated by the bill now before the Senate. It was originally introduced by me something over a year ago in exactly the form recommended by the commission.

May I say in passing that I never knew a committee or a commission of Senators and Representatives to work harder or give more or closer attention to any matter than was given by the members of the commission to the subject under discussion. Mr. ANDERSON, the chairman, prepared a draft of a bill, and night after night we met and worked upon it. Messrs. ROBINSON and HARRISON, representing the Democratic side, were just as active as were Republicans. There was no partisanship in it. There was a sincere desire upon the part of every member of the commission to recommend something to the Congress of the United States that would be substantial in the way of relief to the farmers of the country and yet would stand every test of good, businesslike legislation.

As I said, I introduced the bill in the Senate and Mr. ANDERSON, chairman of the commission, introduced it in the House about a year ago. After the bill was introduced Chairman

ANDERSON and other members of the commission gave further study to the subject. After such study and many conferences, particularly with the Department of Agriculture, they proposed certain amendments, and last December I introduced in the Senate the original bill with the amendments which had been suggested to us.

Mr. President, as I said a moment ago, this bill has but one purpose, and that is to afford the farmers of the United States a credit facility not based upon charity, not based upon generosity, but a credit facility based upon sound business principles that will give the farmers of the country that intermediate credit running from six months to three years which they do not have to-day.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair desires to remind the Senator from Illinois that the Senator from Wisconsin requested not to be interrupted.

Mr. McCORMICK. I was called from the Chamber at the time the Senator made that request.

Mr. LENROOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McCORMICK. I was merely going to ask if the Senator had pointed out during the time when I was absent from the Chamber why it is that private banks do not afford to farmers the intermediate credit to which he refers?

Mr. LENROOT. I have not done so, but I shall be very glad to do so. I had intended to discuss that matter when I came to a consideration of the details of the bill, but I shall be very glad to refer to it now. Private bankers do not now extend a credit of from six months to three years to farmers for just one reason. Sometimes we hear the banks severely criticized for not doing so, but in refusing to do it they are simply following plain business principles. Mr. President, the first duty of a bank is the protection of its depositors, and a bank is not going to extend long-term loans to its customers unless that bank knows that in case of stringency or emergency or the sudden call upon it for its deposits there is some avenue or some facility by which it may discount its paper and pay off its depositors. As I have said, in pursuing that system, we have no right to blame the banks for not extending credit for a longer term than six months.

In that connection I wish to say just a word with reference to what has been so often repeated upon the floor in debate upon the so-called Capper bill and in the Committee on Banking and Currency, of which I am not a member. It has been repeatedly stated that the farmers of the country have furnished 40 per cent of the deposits of the member banks of the Federal reserve system and that the implication therefore follows, or it is tried to have it follow, that because of that fact the farmers were entitled to 40 per cent of the total available credit. Mr. President, a farmer who deposits money in a bank is just as anxious for the protection of that deposit as is a merchant or anyone else. The farmer who deposits money in a bank is just as interested as any other depositor in having loans of that bank either liquid or of such character that should he want his deposit back he is going to be sure to get it. So, when an attempt is made to create a distinction between the farmers' deposits and other deposits, it is simply absurd. The interest of both classes of depositors is exactly the same in that connection.

In reference to the indorsements of this bill, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to append at the end of my remarks in full various indorsements to which I shall refer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STERLING in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. LENROOT. I shall quote from some of those indorsements now. The first indorsement which I desire to place in the RECORD is that of the conference of the National Council of Farmers' Cooperative Marketing Associations, which was held here in the city of Washington last month, when they expressly indorsed all of the essential provisions of the bill. I shall read only one paragraph of their indorsement:

That a farm-credits department in the Federal land banks be set up in each of the land banks with a capital of $5,000,000, making a total of $60,000,000 capitalized, against which credits may be issued to the extent of approximately $600,000,000; and that these farm-credits departments of the Federal farm banks be authorized to discount or purchase agricultural paper in a broad sense and to make loans or advance directly to cooperative marketing associations and agricultural cooperative credit organizations.

The conference at which that indorsement was made, Mr. President, represented more than 100,000 farmers who are members of cooperative agricultural associations.

I next wish to offer the resolution of the Texas and Southwestern Cattle Raisers' Association, expressly indorsing the provisions of this bill.

I am referring to these indorsements of the bill because, as I shall show later from the views of the minority of the committee, the claim is made that this bill is not supported or indorsed by certain organizations therein indicated. The first hearing had upon the bill which I introduced, which was Senate bill 3051, was held on March 10 last. At that time Mr. Atkeson, the legislative representative of the National Grange, appeared before the committee and used this language:

I have read every bill, I think, that has been introduced in Congress during all these years—

And, as Senators know, Mr. Atkeson has represented the National Grange here in Washington for many years—and I read the enormous amount of data furnished by the commission that went to Europe, and I have been somewhat of a student of economics, especially with relation to agriculture; and I want to say for Senator LENROOT's bill that up to this time and down to this place it comes nearer meeting the requirements—the nearest to meeting requirements—than any bill that has ever been introduced in Congress.

Mr. President, in view of Mr. Atkeson's denomination of the bill as the "Lenroot bill," I again wish to say and to emphasize that the credit, if credit there be, for this bill is to be divided among many people.

Then Secretary of Agriculture Wallace appeared before the Committee on Banking and Currency and indorsed the bill. Secretary Hoover appeared before the committee and indorsed the bill. The Federal Reserve Board indorses the bill in this language:

The board has studied these bills—

Referring to the various agricultural credit bills—

very carefully and desires to express its approval of the general purpose of both of them—

Referring to the Capper bill and the pending bill.

Senator LENROOT's bill, S. 4103, appears to be a redraft of his earlier bill, S. 3051, the enactment of which was recommended in the report of the Joint Commission of Agricultural Inquiry, and which received the approval of the Federal Reserve Board in a letter addressed to you by Governor Harding, on behalf of the board, under date of January 26, 1922.

The Federal Farm Loan Board also indorses this bill, notwithstanding the statements of some to the contrary. They have only one suggestion to make with regard to it, and that suggestion does not at all affect the plan or scheme of the bill, but only the agency through which it shall be administered. I now read from the testimony of Judge Lobdell, of the Federal Farm Loan Board:

The Farm Loan Board feels that the Lenroot bill, speaking broadly, is well worked out and proposes a practical and workable plan of meeting this situation, reserving judgment on the wisdom of putting $60,000,000 of Government money into the enterprise, which is again an academic problem.

The American Farm Bureau Federation, Mr. President, also indorses this bill, with the exception that they seek to set up an independent supervising agency in lieu of the Federal Farm Loan Board. That question I shall discuss later on when we come to consider the details of the bill.

Mr. President, what does the bill seek to do? Very briefly, the bill sets up in each of the 12 Federal land banks of the country a separate department of agricultural personal credits, each of the banks so set up having an initial capital of $5,000,000, or a total of $60,000,000, subscribed by the Government of the United States.

The bill provides further that in case any farm land bank shall find that the needs of agricultural credit in the territory served by that bank are greater than the capital so subscribed will afford, then, upon application of the Federal Farm Loan Board, approved by the President, an additional $5,000,000 may be subscribed to that bank.

It is provided that the assets and liabilities of the farm-credit departments of the land banks shall be segregated and kept separate and apart from the assets and liabilities of the present farm land banks, so that the real estate side of the land banks as it now exists will have nothing to do, so far as assets and liabilities are concerned, with the credit side. Both are, however, to be managed by the same board of directors so long as the board continues as at present under temporary organization, but if the time shall come when the permanent organization shall be carried out as now provided by law, the bill provides that, in that event, the credit department of the bank shall be managed by the district directors; or, in other words, by directors appointed by the Federal Farm Loan Board, so that at all times the members of the farm-credit department of each bank will be under the direct control, management, and supervision of the Federal Farm Loan Board.

The reason for this is perfectly plain. If the existing law should be put into effect with reference to local control of the farm land banks by a majority control of directors elected by farm loan associations, it is plain to be seen that a majority control would be had of the farm credits side of these banks by directors who have no interest or concern in the management of the farm credit side, because they represent the real estate loans only of the system. So we have very wisely provided, as I am sure all Senators will agree, that in the event of permanent organization the management of the farm credits side shall devolve upon the directors appointed by the Farm Loan Board.

It is then provided that each farm land bank shall have authority to issue its debentures and sell them to the general public to an amount not exceeding ten times the amount of the capital of the bank; that is to say, each land bank will be authorized to issue debentures to the extent of $50,000,000, making an available capital and borrowing capacity for the purpose of meeting the credit needs of the farmer of $55,000,000 for each bank, or $660,000,000 in all.

It is provided that the rate of discount fixed by the Federal land banks shall never exceed by more than 1 per cent the rate that is fixed in the last preceding issue of debentures that are issued by it; and these debentures may, I say, be issued by the bank for a term not exceeding five years.

The bill provides that the money thus obtained may be used in discounting the notes or paper of banks, incorporated livestock companies, trust companies, rural credit corporations, savings institutions, cooperative banks, and so on, and to agricultural cooperative associations where the loan has been advanced for agricultural purposes by the institution seeking the discount.

It is provided that in no case shall the Federal land bank discount any paper that bears rate of interest in excess of 1½ per cent higher than the discount rate fixed by the land banks.

Then, Mr. President, it is provided, too, that each Federal land bank shall establish, as I have said, a rate of discount, and that rate can not exceed by more than 1 per cent the rate borne by the last preceding issue of debentures.

It is provided that while the credit department in each bank is separate from and has nothing to do with the other departments of the bank, and while each bank is separate in other respects from other land banks, the farm-credit department of each land bank shall be ultimately liable for all of like obligations of every other bank, which is the same in that respect as the liability of our present farm-loan banks upon real estate mortgages.

It is provided that so far as interest coupons are concerned, a bank shall be required to cash those coupons upon presentation if the issuing bank is in default. As to the principal of any debenture, it is provided that after the assets of the issuing bank have been exhausted, then in that case the assets of the other land banks, so far as the farm-credit side is concerned, shall be liable in the proportion named in the bill to take care of that; all this for the purpose of giving greater security and making these debentures more attractive to the general public.

May I say in this connection that what the commission and the committee had in mind with reference to these debentures was that they would prove an attractive security, that they would tap a reservoir of investment capital that would be very glad to enter into the field; but it can not be done and is not being done to-day because there is no opportunity to bring that kind of invested capital to the agricultural paper that is covered by the bill.

Mr. President, I am not attempting now to discuss the bill in detail. I am only attempting to give a very general outline of the bill. When we come to consider it section by section I shall expect, of course, to discuss the several provisions in greater detail.

I think I have covered the essential features of the scheme or plan of the bill.

It is provided that these debentures shall be exempt from taxation. I know that there is some objection to that. I think my own position upon the subject of tax-exempt securities is well known. I wish there were not a tax-exempt security in the United States. I shall cheerfully vote for a constitutional amendment on the subject, and I hope we may pass the joint resolution that passed the House two days ago amending the Constitution in that respect, so that tax-exempt securities will not be issued in the future; but so long as they do exist, and in view of the present need of the farmers of this country, this is not the time or place, it seems to me, for us to stop issuing tax-exempt securities. Unlike most other tax-exempt securities, that have anywhere from 20 to 40 years to run, it must be remembered that this security has only 5 years to run, and whenever the constitutional amendment is adopted preventing the issue of tax-exempt securities it will operate upon this class of debentures quicker than upon any other class existing in the United States to-day.

Mr. President, the other portions of this bill are identical, or will be made identical, I presume, with the like provisions of the Capper bill amending the Federal reserve act, except in one or two particulars to which I shall refer later, where they had no place in the Capper bill but do have a very proper place in this bill. They are, in short, the extension of the eligibility of agricultural paper for rediscount in the Federal reserve bank from six months to nine months, and the provision with reference to making it more attractive for State banks to enter the system, both by reducing the capital requirements and by providing under certain conditions for a larger distribution of earnings.

Now, Mr. President, I want to take up very briefly the minority report that has been made by my good friend the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORRICK] with reference to this bill.

In the minority report, the Senator states:

The inadequacy of Senate bill 4287 is apparent. It provides for setting aside $60,000,000 from the Treasury (which money is not to be used for loans, but only for paying losses, if any).

Mr. President, I am astonished that the Senator from South Dakota should give any such construction to the bill. If this report had been drawn merely from reading the majority committee report, by one who had not read the bill, I would not have been surprised, because there happens to be a typographical error in the committee report. The phrase in the report is "obligations from losses," while the bill reads, as any one can see, "obligations and losses." When the language is that the capital shall be used solely for the purpose of paying obligations and losses, how anyone could so construe this bill that it will not permit the capital to be used as a working capital I am utterly unable to understand. Whether it be a discount, whether it be paying the salary of the manager or cashier of the bank, in every case before a dollar can be paid out of course there must be an obligation to pay it out; and so the word "obligations" covers every possible purpose that could be had in considering this $5,000,000 as working capital of the bank.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, will the Senator call our attention to the provision in the bill to which he adverts?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; page 7, lines 6 and 7.

I think where my friend perhaps got misled was through the use of the word "solely," although I confess that I can not quite understand it then; but this provision has just one purpose. Here was the farm land bank. A new activity is to be added to it—a farm-credits department. The purpose of this was to make it clear that there should be complete segregation of the business of the real-estate side of a land bank with the business of the farm-credit side, and so we provide:

Capital so allocated to a farm-credits department, and the surplus earnings of such department, shall be applied solely to meet obligations and losses, if any, incurred in the operation of that department; and the capital subscribed, together with the reserve and accumulations from earnings under Title I—shall not be applied to meeting obligations or losses, if any, incurred in the operation of any farm-credits department.

That is the present law—

That is to say that none of its capital and none of its surplus can be used to pay any obligation of the real-estate side of a bank upon the one hand, and, in case of the real-estate side, none of its capital or surplus shall be used for the payment of obligations on this side; but inasmuch as the very able Senator from South Dakota has raised this question, at the proper time I shall offer an amendment making it so clear that there can be no possible question about it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I think the purpose is quite clear as indicated by the Senator from Wisconsin; but, inasmuch as he suggests an amendment, I should like to inquire of him whether the whole purpose would not be met by taking out all of line 7 to the word "of," so that it will read "shall be applied solely to meet obligations of that department"? Why mention any losses?

Mr. LENROOT. I think that would cover it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That would remove, it seems to me, all question on the subject.

Mr. LENROOT. I think that is true.

With reference to the inadequacy of the capital of $60,000,000, I appreciate that there are many bills pending before the Senate and in the House that propose that the Government shall furnish all the capital for the credit needs of the farmers of this country. Some of them propose to furnish as much as $500,000,000. As I said in the beginning, the farmers are not asking—although sometimes those who purport to represent them do ask—generosity upon the part of the Government, the paying out to them of money that can not be sustained upon business principles; but it is my observation and belief that the farmers of the United States are asking nothing more of the Government of the United States than to be considered as business men, and that any credit that they may receive through the instrumentality of the Government shall be given them based upon business principles.

It is readily understood, of course, that if the Government is to ladle out money from the Treasury we are not very likely to have very sound business principles applied to such loans; but if the Government is to provide only the working capital, as is provided in this bill, and the main part of the credit coming to the farmers is to come through the proceeds of debentures sold to the general public, it necessarily means that in the management of each bank there must be that care and application of business principles that would be applied in private business. Otherwise the debentures will not be attractive; they will not be sold to the general public. That is the way it ought to be, unless the Congress of the United States wishes to take the position that we are going to treat the farmers of this country as a privileged class, grant them special privileges that we do not grant to any other class of people, and say to them: "Here is the Treasury of the United States open to you to a practically unlimited amount."

Mr. President, if there is any one thing the farmer of this country has made it plain he is against it is special privilege generally to anybody, and he is not asking for himself that which he would deny to anybody else.

Now, to go on with the criticism of this bill, the minority report states:

While it is proposed that each bank may borrow ten times the amount of its guaranty fund, no witness before the committee suggested the possibility of such an amount being available.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. KENDRICK. I wanted to ask the Senator if he knew of any reason why the entire amount of capital invested by the Government should not finally be retired and paid back to the Government, as I believe is the provision of law under the Federal farm loan act?

Mr. LENROOT. There is only one reason, and I am frank to say that that million dollars might well be reduced. But the Senator will remember this distinction, that under the present system the capital stock of the Government is retired and farm-loan associations own the stock, while no such thing exists with reference to the farm credit side of the institution. It being a stock institution, if all the stock were retired, there would be no capital stock at all; it would be surplus only. But I am frank to say that I do not know why that might not be reduced to a nominal amount rather than fixed at a million dollars.

Mr. KENDRICK. Does the Senator believe it would be an impracticable plan to have those institutions which rediscount paper with the banks or with the Federal farm loan credit system participate in the purchase of stock, the same as is provided under the Federal reserve system?

Mr. LENROOT. The committee very fully investigated that very question; and in our first draft of the bill, as members of the committee who were present know, we did provide for credit loan associations on subscriptions of stock very similar to the present system. We sent out questionnaires all over the country; we got the most expert advice we could get; and we came to the conclusion that, inasmuch as this is not intended in any way to be a profit-making institution, inasmuch as necessarily the profit can not be any substantial sum, or should not be any substantial sum over expenses, there would not be any attraction, in all probability, for any person or institution to become a stockholder in this institution.

The minority report states that—

No witness before the committee suggested the possibility of such an amount being available.

I am not going to take the time now to go through the testimony adduced before the committee, but certainly my friend from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] has not read the testimony, or he would not make that statement. I was a witness before that committee. I stated very frankly to the committee the source of the information which led me to form an opinion as to whether these debentures should be available, and I am glad to state the source of my information to the Senate.

In the first place, the Joint Commission of Agricultural Inquiry got the advice of representatives of bond houses and other financial institutions of New York and elsewhere and asked them whether, if such a scheme as we proposed should go through, in their opinion such debentures would be readily salable, and the opinion was nearly unanimous that they would prove a most attractive investment, provided there was sound management of the land banks. Of course, we must all admit that unless there be such management not only would the debenture part of the scheme fail but it would be only a little while before the whole thing would fail. This, like any other financial institution, depends for its success upon management on business principles.

But more than that, Mr. President, there is what is known as the administrative committee of the American Bankers' Association, consisting of some 25 members, I believe. They held a meeting here in Washington recently, and they are representative of the bankers and financial institutions of different parts of the country. At their invitation I spent an evening with them here and went over this bill. I took very special pains to get their opinion as to whether the debentures provided for in this bill would be an attractive investment. Out of those 25 men, there was only one, I believe, who expressed any doubt concerning that question, provided always there was sound, efficient management of the banks, so that they could rely upon the business judgment of the directors and officers of the farm-credit departments of the banks.

The minority report further states that—

The plan is to purchase agricultural paper from the banks; in other words, it is a plan to assist the banks to extend credit to the farmers. It is the banks that the board has to deal with.

It is not proposed under this bill to make any loans to farmers.

Of course, it is not proposed to make loans to farmers, Mr. President; and, if anybody seriously proposes that the Government make loans direct to farmers, he may think he is a friend of the farmer, but he is not, in so proposing, because if the Government ever goes into the business of making loans to farmers directly, unless it is to consider the farmer an object of charity, and therefore willing to sustain enormous losses in the transaction of his business, it will be necessary for the Government then to exercise the same care, the same supervision over each individual loan to the farmer, that a careful banker or sound credit institution in the locality would exercise, and what would it cost to exercise that kind of supervision? If some official, or some central bank, as proposed by some Senators, or farm land bank, as proposed in this bill, is to make individual loans to farmers, and send its agents to ascertain the financial responsibility and the character and industry of each individual farmer borrower, what is it going to cost in overhead? Who is going to pay the cost? Perhaps these gentlemen think the Government will pay it. It may be; but the Government ought not to pay that kind of a cost; and, if the farmer is to pay it, it would result in an increase of at least 1 per cent in his interest rate.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President, does not the Senator believe that even under the operation of this bill the ordinary course of banking will continue, and that the majority of loans to the farmers will be made by the banks, and that the length of loans only will be affected by this bill? That is to say, the banks will largely make the loans, as they have in the past, for a longer time, because they have assurance of rediscount without any question in case they find it necessary to realize on the loan.

Mr. LENROOT. I agree absolutely with the Senator upon that; and in this connection I want to read the first paragraph of the report of the national convention of cooperative associations upon that very point. They use this language:

That this national council announces as a general policy that the primary reliance of the farmer for credits for production or for marketing should be upon the local banker, and that under normal conditions the local banker is likely to meet the greater part of such needs.

Mr. KENDRICK. That is, that potential credits to the bank will govern the situation. They will be free to lend their funds, even though their funds are those of depositors, because they can realize on the loans, and in the meantime they will keep the loans in their vaults as much as is consistent.

Mr. LENROOT. That is true; but in case they should not do that, in case for any reason a bank in any locality would be unfair to the farmer and seek to use its funds for speculative purposes, the bill does provide that institutions other than banks will be recognized. They may be cooperative institutions, they may be cooperative banks, they may be credit associations, but it furnishes direct incentive to the bank to take care of the needs of its own locality and community on business principles.

In this connection, I understand, of course, the feeling that is attempted to be aroused against all of the banks of this country. I hold no brief for the banks; but in so far as this agricultural need is concerned, it is the small bank, comparatively speaking, that is affected. The great banks of New York City are not expected to extend any very large amount of agricultural credits, but it is the little bank in the farming communities of this country that will be affected by this bill, and I deny that those banks, generally speaking, are enemies of the farmer. They are absolutely dependent upon the farmer for their own prosperity, and it is to the direct interest of the little banks of this country to serve the needs of the farmers.

I do not question, of course, that the banker tries to make money, and he has his own selfish interests, just as every other man engaged in business has; but in this bill we provide that the bank which seeks to charge a higher rate than 1½ per cent in excess of the discount rate shall not have its paper discounted by the Federal land bank at all.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I am a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, and I have made some study of this measure. Addressing myself to the Senator from Wisconsin, I have heard the statement made that there was a very great danger in this measure; that it might affect injuriously the smaller banks in the agricultural sections of the country. Has the Senator thought of that or has he heard that statement made?

Mr. LENROOT. I would be glad if the Senator would suggest in what way there could be any danger.

Mr. CALDER. Through competition of a Government institution with those banks.

Mr. LENROOT. I am very frank to say to the Senator from New York that the great difficulty with reference to the small banks of the country to-day is not undue competition with any possible outside institution in dealing with the farmers but the lack of funds in the bank to take care of the needs of the farmers.

Mr. CALDER. I have no information to lead me to believe the statement I made was correct, but it has been made to me, and I wanted to be certain that the Senator had thought of it.

Mr. LENROOT. I do not think there is anything to that.

Mr. GLASS. I think it would be interesting to the Senate if the Senator from Wisconsin would indicate what he thinks of the principle of taking the Government's money and loaning it directly to any class of people, aside from the question of overhead charge and the difficulties of effectively conducting a system of that sort.

Mr. LENROOT. I can not imagine any activity of the Government that could lead to greater abuse, to greater discrimination, and to greater losses to the taxpayers than a system such as is suggested by some of our good friends.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. DIAL. As a matter of fact, the stockholders of small banks are usually the farmers of the community. They are the principal stockholders really. The Senator states there are not sufficient funds in the small banks. I would suggest, as a remedy for that, that we eliminate some of the small banks. We have too many small banks. They ought to increase their capital, and then they ought to join the Federal reserve system.

Mr. LENROOT. That is undoubtedly true. What our small banks are suffering from is lack of capital, lack of loaning power. I think there are a great many communities in the United States where it would be to the interest of the customers of the banks and of the banks themselves if they would combine, and cut out a great deal of overhead that serves no possible good useful purpose to anybody.

Mr. DIAL. Furthermore, they do not avail themselves of the credit they would get by being members of the Federal reserve system.

Mr. BROOKHART and Mr. NORBECK addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. LENROOT. I will yield first to the Senator from Iowa, and then I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. BROOKHART. I would like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin, on the theory that the banks ought to be united or combined, should not the bill provide some method whereby farmers might accomplish the purpose by cooperative banking direct?

Mr. LENROOT. That can be done by State law, and if done under a State law, they are recognized by the bill.

Mr. BROOKHART. But about half of our banks, perhaps not quite half, are national banks.

Mr. LENROOT. About one-third.

Mr. BROOKHART. Well, say about one-third are national banks. That portion of the banking business should have the same rights among the farmers that the banks have under the State laws, it seems to me, and yet no such provision is made in the bill.

Mr. LENROOT. There is no such provision.

Mr. BROOKHART. Would there be objection to incorporating such a permissive provision in the bill, which would give the farmers that opportunity?

Mr. LENROOT. I am very frank to say that, as far as amendments to the bill are concerned, I certainly hope that the Senator will not press such an amendment, because he realizes quite as well as I do that, although he and I might fully agree, any attempt to thrash out that question of national cooperative banking upon the pending bill means there would be no bill passed at this session.

Mr. BROOKHART. I could not agree with that conclusion. Of course, the Senate ought seriously to take up the question. It is the most important of all.

Mr. LENROOT. I hope it will not be pressed where it would mean the defeat of the pending bill.

Mr. BROOKHART. It seems to me if we merely adopt a piecemeal policy that does not really comprehend the farmers' question, we will live to regret it very seriously.

Mr. LENROOT. Highly as I value the judgment of the Senator from Iowa, I would rather take the judgment of the farm organizations of the country upon that question than I would his.

Mr. BROOKHART. I have talked to representatives of most of the farm organizations from which the Senator has read, and I find they are in a state of mind that they are glad to have any little help whatever, but I have not talked to any of them who regard the bill as adequate for the situation.

Mr. LENROOT. Not one of them has suggested to any committee or to the agricultural commission the amendment which the Senator now suggests. The Senator knows it is a matter that can not be put upon a bill of this kind in a day. Of course, if the Senator desires to defeat the pending legislation, I suppose he could attempt it.

Mr. BROOKHART. It seems to me the farmers have a right to more than a day's consideration of that proposition. There are other matters here which are not so urgent as that and which could easily be laid aside to give the necessary time to fully consider it.

Mr. LENROOT. Of course, if the Senator desires to take such time upon this bill as will open up a question of that kind, and thus possibly defeat the bill, he will take that responsibility, but I shall not be a party to it.

Mr. BROOKHART. I am not particularly afraid of the responsibility for it, if it is on the theory that in the end it is going to accomplish the right thing.

Mr. LENROOT. Of course, it has always been the case that some friends of the farmer, because they can not get something they think they ought to have in addition to what is proposed, would rather see the farmers get nothing at all.

Mr. BROOKHART. The result of all the piecemeal policy has been that the farmers have not only got nothing but worse than nothing. They have been set back about every time we have gone ahead with such inadequate legislation.

Mr. LENROOT. Of course, the Senator thinks that the salvation of the farmer is cooperative banking. He has a right to that opinion, of course, but it is rather curious that the farm organizations of the country have not taken that up and pressed it upon Congress. The Senator is the only one who has suggested it.

Mr. BROOKHART. I will say to the Senator that the National Farmers' Union have pressed it very strongly, and they have been longer studying the cooperative question than any farm organization in the country. The National Farm Equity Society have been doing the same thing. They adopted it in their national convention. The Iowa Farm Bureau Federation did the same thing, and the president of the State organization called on me the other day. It is the biggest farm bureau organization in the United States by many thousands. So I know something of what those people want to do.

Mr. LENROOT. I have referred, as the Senator well knows, to the different farm organizations which have made certain requests of Congress for legislation at this session of Congress, and I have never heard of one of them, nor have I read anything from any of them, making the request which the Senator now proposes.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. LENROOT. I promised to yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. NORBECK. I will wait.

Mr. LENROOT. Then I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. The bill provides for a capital of $5,000,000 for each of the Federal land banks, with a possible increase of $5,000,000 more; that is, the Government may put up, to begin with, $60,000,000, and may possibly increase it to $120,000,000. I take it the Senator can only justify the Government furnishing the capital to do this business, and continuing it as a permanent, going concern, upon the theory that the Government is eventually to get back its capital. Am I correct in that understanding?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; it will get back most of it.

Mr. FLETCHER. The bill provides for the retirement of that capital down to $1,000,000 for each bank. Why does the Senator believe that it is necessary to retain the $1,000,000?

Mr. LENROOT. The same question has been asked and I have replied, just a little while ago.

Mr. FLETCHER. I was not present at the time.

Mr. LENROOT. I have stated the distinction between the Government's subscription to this capital and the subscription to the present system is that eventually other stockholders take the place of the Government as a stockholder under the present system, while under the pending bill there are no stockholders except the Government. It is in the form of a corporation, of course, but, as I said before, I see no reason why we should not reduce it to a mere nominal amount.

Mr. FLETCHER. I did not know that question had been raised before, but it occurred to me in reading the bill that there was some reason for retaining the capital of $1,000,000 which I could not quite understand. I know under the farm loan act the Government contributed $750,000 to the capital of each bank, but that will all come back to the Government. Some of the banks have already been taken over by the national farm loan associations.

With reference to the use of the capital, at page 7 the bill provides—

Mr. GLASS. The Senator from Wisconsin has already explained that feature.

Mr. FLETCHER. I was not aware of that. I would like to get an answer now for my own information. I was not aware the Senator had already answered as to the use of the capital.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; I had. I would prefer to discuss the matter when we come to reading the bill for amendments. Of course, that is to be used for working capital.

Mr. FLETCHER. I would like to ask the Senator whether any of the capital is to be used in furnishing money for discount of paper?

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly. That is to be used as working capital, of course.

Mr. FLETCHER. It seems to me the word "solely" perhaps ought to be stricken out.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator again has fallen into the same error that the Senator from South Dakota did. The word "solely" is there only for the purpose of making it clear that none of the capital shall be used to pay obligations of the farm land real estate side on the one hand, and that the obligations of the real estate side shall not be paid out of the capital on the other side. I am perfectly willing to make that clear, in order that there shall be no question about it, and I shall at the proper time offer an amendment to clarify it.

Mr. FLETCHER. It seems to me it is very ambiguous, to say the least, and it ought to be made more clear.

Mr. LENROOT. Let me ask the Senator a question. The Senator does not think we can pay out any money by this bank or any other bank unless it is in payment of some obligation, does he?

Mr. FLETCHER. There would be no obligation unless it was allowed to use the money.

Mr. LENROOT. They are allowed to agree to discount the paper, are they not? They are allowed to agree to pay the salary of the manager, are they not? Do not those then become obligations?

Mr. FLETCHER. I think that is the trouble. I think the salaries and the actual running expenses of the institution would be obligations.

Mr. LENROOT. If they agree to discount paper, does it not become an obligation?

Mr. FLETCHER. After it is discounted.

Mr. LENROOT. If they agree to discount it, they contract to discount it.

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes; but I think—

Mr. LENROOT. But there is no use spending time upon it, because I am going to offer an amendment to make it perfectly clear.

Mr. FLETCHER. Very well.

Mr. LENROOT. I would like to proceed, because I wish to conclude. The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] desires to bring up the legislative appropriation bill.

The minority report goes on to say that—

Most of the expert witnesses considered the Lenroot bill impractical.

I would ask my friend from South Dakota what witnesses expressed any such view except Secretary Mellon, Mr. Leffingwell, Judge Lobdell, and the distinguished Senator himself?

Mr. NORBECK. I have been quite patient since the Chair announced that the Senator from Wisconsin did not want to be interrupted, otherwise I should not have let some of his statements go unchallenged.

I recall, for instance, that when Judge Lobdell was asked whether the debentures were salable and if it would work out unless they were salable he said in substance: "I have heard a more competent man than myself dodge that question." Lobdell went on to intimate that though four times as much could be sold it would be possible to conduct it, but he never suggested ten times. He did not say four times could be sold. But I do not care to go into that at this time. Read Hoover's testimony and see if he does not suggest a more radical change in order to make the system operative.

Mr. LENROOT. I have read Judge Lobdell's testimony. The language of the minority report is:

Most of the expert witnesses considered the Lenroot bill impractical.

For the benefit of the Senator I will read again:

The Farm Loan Board feels that the Lenroot bill, speaking broadly, is well worked out and proposes a practical and workable plan of meeting the situation.

Judge Lobdell made just one suggestion to the committee, and that was that the administration be placed in the Federal reserve bank and that the words "Federal reserve bank" be substituted for the words "Farm Loan Board" in every case.

Mr. NORBECK. I have taken the position that the Senator from Wisconsin was entitled to get his bill in the best form possible. I supported many of his amendments in the committee. I have no disposition to-day to inject myself unduly into his presentation of the matter. He is entitled to a fair chance to present the matter to the Senate in the best way possible, but since the questions were asked me I want to answer them. What was the particular question?

Mr. LENROOT. The statement was made in the minority report:

Most of the expert witnesses considered the Lenroot bill impractical.

Mr. NORBECK. Yes. For instance, the Senator from Wisconsin has said the farmer needs three years' credit. Under the system proposed in the bill he is proposing to put the matter in charge of men who do not believe in three years' credit.

Mr. LENROOT. I have just read to the Senate Judge Lobdell's opinion of it.

Mr. NORBECK. But did he not also say he would not make a three-year loan if it were put under him?

Mr. LENROOT. That might be, but Judge Lobdell testified, and I have read it twice to the Senate, that the Farm Loan Board considered it a workable and practical scheme.

Of course, I admit that it may be difficult to sell three-year paper; but the Senator well knows that the bill provides for classifying paper, and it may be classified both as to term and as to purpose. It may be difficult; I am not guaranteeing that we can sell $50,000,000 of three-year paper under this scheme; no, but, so far as one can judge in advance from the opinions of men who ought to know, they do, without exception, save such as I shall refer to in a moment, express the opinion that it is a workable and practical scheme. Secretary of the Treasury Mellon, however, says it is not. I wonder if the Senator from South Dakota agrees with Mr. Mellon? What is Mr. Mellon's objection? His objection is to the Government furnishing any capital at all, as the Senator well knows.

Mr. NORBECK. I beg pardon. Secretary Mellon suggested that if the land banks should conduct this kind of personal credit business there would need to be a reorganization of the system. That was one of the things he said.

Mr. LENROOT. My statement still stands, that Mr. Mellon has objected to the Government furnishing any of the capital. So has Mr. Leffingwell. Those are the only two experts who appeared before the committee, so far as I remember or of whom I have read, who condemn the bill; and I am sure my friend from South Dakota would not care to follow the leadership of either of those gentlemen upon farm-credit legislation.

Mr. NORBECK. If I were to follow the leadership of Judge Lobdell I might easily conclude that there might not be any debentures that were salable at all, and we considered him an expert witness.

Mr. LENROOT. I again wish to say that I put against the Senator's statement the testimony of Judge Lobdell, that he considers the system practicable and workable.

Mr. NORBECK. That is another part of the testimony, and the Senator proposes to take only one part of the testimony. I propose to take it all.

Mr. LENROOT. When we come to discuss the details of the bill I shall be very glad to read Judge Lobdell's testimony with respect to the sale of debentures generally. He expressed his doubt as to the long-term three-year debentures, as the Senator from South Dakota well knows.

Mr. President, the views of the minority of the committee state that—

Some provision should be made in rural-credit legislation whereby farmers, who are financially responsible, can conveniently associate themselves into groups for the purpose of securing loans for individuals upon the indorsement of the members of the group.

As I have said, the agricultural commission carefully considered that; it inserted such a provision in the bill at one time; but witnesses appeared before us, and experts and representatives of the farm organizations, I think, were unanimously in agreement that the farmers would not indorse accommodation paper one for the other under the system of personal liability; and I have found no one since who for a moment believes that the farmers of this country will agree to organize into groups of 20 or 30 and each become liable for all of the obligations of the other members of the group. That is why we left that provision out of the bill. It was because there was no use putting something in the bill which we knew in advance would not be workable.

Then, there is the question of separate agencies. Of course, I understand that the proposition is advanced that the War Finance Corporation should be the agency employed; but, Mr. President, I am opposed, as a proposition for permanent law, to having the War Finance Corporation or any other central agency deal with this question. So far as it can be, without excessive cost in the way of interest rates, it should be brought to the locality. I am sorry that we can not go still further into the locality; that we can not go nearer each individual farmer. The only reason we have not provided for doing so in this bill is because of the overhead expense that would be involved, resulting in an increased rate of interest to the farmer.

I do not remember whether or not the minority views contain the statement, but I have seen it stated that a reduction of one-half per cent in the interest rate is equivalent to a 20 per cent reduction of freight rates to the farmer. I do not know whether or not that is contained in the views of the minority, but I have seen it somewhere.

Mr. NORBECK. That is the testimony of Secretary Wallace.

Mr. LENROOT. That being so, Mr. President, would not the farmers at this moment welcome as a godsend to them a reduction of 20 per cent in their freight rates, but ought it not to be our very grave concern to see to it that the expense of the administration of a rural-credit system, whatever it might be, shall be brought down to the lowest point possible, and the farmer get the benefit in the interest rate?

Mr. President, with reference to the need of a separate agency, the American Farm Bureau Federation indorses this bill, except it does ask for—and I expect an amendment will be proposed to create—a separate agency here in Washington to take the place of the Farm Loan Board for the purposes of supervision. In all other respects the American Farm Bureau Federation indorses the bill. I think, perhaps, they would like to have a flat capital of $10,000,000 for each bank instead of making it conditional, as we propose.

With reference to their proposal for a separate agency, I shall reserve the discussion of that until the amendment to which I have referred is proposed. I will only say now in passing that it would be a very anomalous thing to create a supervising agency over a bank over the directors of which that supervising agency would have no control so far as policy is concerned. Under the amendment which is proposed the directors would still be appointed by the Farm Loan Board, and all that the separate agency would have the power to do would be to administer the restrictions, limitations, and conditions which are provided for in the bill.

Mr. President, I shall not undertake to go into any further details at this time, but before concluding I wish to say that the benefit to the farmer by reason of this proposed legislation is not to be measured either by the capital which is to be provided by the Government or by the amount of the debentures which may be issued, making a maximum of loans and capital of $660,000,000. To my mind the chief benefit to the farmer will consist in the liberality of his local bank, whether it be

State or National, in extending to him loans running from six months to three years, which those banks do not extend at all at this time, and can not be expected to extend, because they do not know, in case of stress or call upon their deposits, where they could turn in order to realize upon the paper upon which they have advanced money. So, in my opinion, what will actually happen under this bill will be that the banks of the country in the agricultural communities will extend credit running from six months to three years to the full extent of their resources. They will do so knowing that if there should be any sudden call upon them they may rediscount that agricultural paper with a Federal land bank; but, in the absence of that emergency or call, they will keep that farm-loan paper in their vaults; it never will reach the Federal land bank at all. So we can not measure the amount of credit that will be afforded to the farmer by reason of the passage of this bill. We do know that it will be very much more than the maximum of the $660,000,000 that is provided.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Does not the Senator mean $60,000,000?

Mr. LENROOT. Sixty million dollars capital and $600,000,000 debentures is the maximum that may be allowed.

Mr. President, in conclusion I wish to repeat that this bill had the consideration and is the product of the Joint Commission of Agricultural Inquiry, composed of both Republicans and Democrats. It has had the consideration of the Committee on Banking and Currency, and is supported by both Republicans and Democrats. I believe that it embodies a workable scheme, one which may be defended on business methods, and it will give to the farmer what he has a right to ask, namely, credit based upon business principles. If, peradventure, the time should come when the limitations of this bill as to capital or debentures are such as not to provide sufficient credit to meet the needs of the farmer, it will then be time to consider amendments. As I understand, the position of its opponents is that they desire to have a larger amount of money out of the Treasury used for the purpose contemplated. I submit, Mr. President, that if we provide a possible $120,000,000, with an additional possibility of $1,200,000,000 for this purpose, we have well served the needs of agriculture for the intermediate credit of which to-day it is sadly in need.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, before the Senator concludes I should like to ask him a question regarding the practical operation of the bill. For instance, at page 4 the bill provides:

(b) Subject to the approval of the Farm Loan Board to issue and to sell collateral trust debentures or other such obligations with a maturity—

And so forth.

Does the Senator in considering how the bill will be put into operation hold that applications for loans, for instance, will be made to the Federal land banks and when they will have approached a certain amount then the Federal land bank must submit the applications and the data regarding them to the Farm Loan Board and obtain permission of the Farm Loan Board to issue debentures? Will that be the process, or how will the consent of the Farm Loan Board in the actual operation of this plan be obtained for the issuing of debentures?

Mr. LENROOT. I would expect, Mr. President, in the same way that the consent of the Farm Loan Board is now obtained with reference to the issuing of farm loan bonds. What will actually happen, I think, will be that a portion of the $5,000,000 will be actually used for the purpose of making advances as provided in the bill, and after they have accumulated two or three million dollars they will make a proposal to issue debentures. They would show to the Farm Loan Board the paper they had on hand; and the Farm Loan Board unquestionably, being competent in the management of the affairs of the system, and having full control over the directorship, without passing upon each piece of paper, for they will expect the farm land banks to do that, will give approval to the issuing, we will say, of $3,000,000 of debentures upon the showing that the land banks had loaned already out of their capital $3,000,000.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator does not believe that that will bring about delays that will hinder the operation of the system?

Mr. LENROOT. No; I do not think so at all.

APPENDIX.

NATIONAL COUNCIL OF FARMERS' COOPERATIVE
MARKETING ASSOCIATIONS,
Dallas, Tex., December 19, 1922.

MY DEAR SIR: The National Council of Farmers' Cooperative Marketing Associations, held in Washington, December 14, 15, and 16, was attended by delegates representing more than 100,000 farmers, grouped in 80 of the largest associations, doing an active business of more than $1,000,000,000 per year in the marketing of farm crops.

These business organizations are the groups which, above all others, will be specifically affected by any rural credits legislation which Congress may pass at this session; therefore their interest in the matter is acute.

You will find inclosed herewith the report of the rural credits committee, unanimously adopted by the council, and also the report of the committee on resolutions, which was similarly adopted.

We sincerely hope that the suggestions contained therein may be of some value to you in your deliberations on these various measures.

Sincerely yours,

NATIONAL COUNCIL OF FARMERS' COOPERATIVE
MARKETING ASSOCIATIONS.
CARL WILLIAMS, Acting Chairman.

To Hon. ROBERT W. BINGHAM,
Chairman Conference National Council of Farmers' Cooperative Marketing Association.

Your committee on rural credits beg leave to submit the following report:

The committee on rural credits of the National Council of Farmers' Cooperative Marketing Association has made a survey of the subject of farmers' credits and the legislation proposed on such rural credits. Your committee recommends as follows:

1. That this national council announce as a general policy that the primary reliance of the farmer for credits for production or for marketing should be upon the local banker, and that under normal conditions the local banker is likely to meet the greater part of such needs.

2. That the Federal reserve system should be modified so as to meet the special requirements of farm credits and to permit the financing of farmers and farmers' cooperative marketing associations conveniently and efficiently through normal banking channels.

That such modification involves primarily the extension of the maturity of agricultural paper to a maximum limit of nine months, with the fixing of cooperative marketing for loans on such agricultural paper to any one cooperative marketing association to be fixed as 50 per cent of the capital and surplus of banks, members of the Federal reserve system, subject to the State laws wherever applicable, and that encouragement and inducement be made to have more State banks exercise the privilege of membership in the Federal reserve system.

4. That adequate opportunity be presented for the creation of agricultural credit corporations with sufficient minimum capital to purchase or discount ordinary agricultural paper with a maximum maturity of nine months and live-stock paper with a maturity of not more than three years, with rediscount corporations adequately capitalized to purchase such paper from agricultural credit corporations, with the privilege of rediscounting any such paper, without indorsement, through the Federal reserve system.

5. That the maximum basis of loans from farm-land banks be raised from $10,000 to $25,000.

5. That a farm credits department in the Federal land banks be set up in each of the land banks with a capital of $5,000,000, making a total of $60,000,000 capitalized, against which credits may be issued to the extent of approximately $600,000,000; and that these farm credits departments of the Federal farm banks be authorized to discount or purchase agricultural paper in a broad sense and to make loans or advance directly to cooperative marketing associations and agricultural credit organizations.

6. That the right of the Federal land bank to purchase production credits shall be limited to production credits where the note of the individual is indorsed by the cooperative credit association, or is secured by a chattel mortgage on implements or animals, or both, and indorsed by the local banks, or where the note or draft itself is made by a cooperative credit association or producers, and that any Federal land bank may exercise any of the power herein granted in any section or district of the United States.

And your committee further recommends that the Committee on Banking and Currency of the House and Senate be requested to consider these suggestions and to combine them if possible into a rural credits act, to be introduced in such way as the committee may deem advisable.

Your committee recommends that the council announce as its policy that the cooperative marketing associations do not ask anything from the Federal Government, except that legislation be enacted to permit farmers and farmers' organizations to have the same access to the Federal credits system, adapted to its needs, that all other industries now possess; and to make provision for unforeseen emergencies by setting up a last reserve in such a manner as is above suggested in the farm credits department of the farm land banks.

Your committee further recommends that this council take action through every individual member representing every cooperative association to make immediate personal contact with the Senators and Congressmen from each State to urge that a rule be secured setting aside consideration of other bills until this legislation is secured; and that all of the farm organizations be asked to unite in support of legislation as generally outlined above.

Respectfully submitted.

JAMES C. STONE, Chairman.

LIVE-STOCK CREDITS.

TEXAS AND SOUTHWESTERN CATTLE RAISERS' ASSOCIATION,
Fort Worth, Tex., January 15, 1923.

DEAR SIR: We ask your earnest consideration of the accompanying resolution outlining the views of members of the executive committee of this association on the subject of live-stock credits.

Live-stock producers need loans for periods commensurate with the turnover of their business and at low interest rates. Banks and loan companies can not now extend credit for such periods, for the reason there is no dependable credit reservoir where the notes may be discounted in times of stress. Stockmen and farmers are frequently forced to sacrifice immature live stock and valuable breeding herds on a declining market to meet maturing obligations and expenses. The ones often hit hardest are the owners of breeding herds—the very foundation of the business.

Timely aid by the War Finance Corporation a few months ago helped prevent the collapse of the live-stock industry. Even before that, in 1913, it was necessary for the corporation to make loans on the breeding herds of the Southwest. Many worthy producers have not been able to meet the collateral requirements of the corporation, but millions have been loaned for periods commensurate with the turnover of the business and at low interest rates. These loans, coupled with the knowledge that an agency existed where such loans could be discounted, helped restore confidence in the business and stabilize values.

The corporation is only a temporary agency. The importance of our industry justifies a permanent reservoir of credit, which can be depended upon in times of stress to do for the live-stock producers what the Federal reserve system does for other branches of commerce.

We urge you to support the Lenroot-Anderson bills.

Yours very truly,

C. B. LUCAS, President.

Mr. A. C. Williams will file with the Committee on Banking and Currency a statement further outlining our views on this subject.

Resolution by executive committee of Texas & Southwestern Cattle Raisers' Association, indorsing the Lenroot-Anderson bills.

Whereas banks of deposit are primarily adapted to the extension of credit to industries having a rapid turnover and requiring only short-time loans, and banks and other existing agencies are not capable of extending necessary credit to farmers and stockmen for periods commensurate with the turnover of their business; and

Whereas agriculture and live-stock production have been and are now being retarded and millions of dollars of wealth produced by hard labor destroyed because of an inadequate credit system; and

Whereas public interest, by reason of the important part of agriculture and live-stock production in the commerce of the Nation, demands that there be provided a credit system which meets the needs of farmers and stockmen to the extent that existing agencies meet the needs of other branches of commerce; Therefore be it

Resolved, That the executive committee of the Texas & Southwestern Cattle Raisers' Association, in session at Fort Worth, Tex., December 19, 1922, recommends and urges the speedy enactment of the Lenroot and Anderson bills. This committee wishes to emphasize the necessity of a permanent reservoir of credit which live-stock producers can depend upon in times of stress, and which gives assurance of reasonable rates of interest, and to particularly urge the following provisions of pending bills:

1. The establishment of farm-credit departments in Federal land banks, each such department to have not less than $5,000,000 Government capital and authority to issue properly secured debentures. These funds to be available for the purchase or discount through banks, trust companies, incorporated loan companies, and cooperative associations of producers of notes which have a maturity of not less than six months and not more than three years and are properly secured by live stock or agricultural products.

2. Amendment of the Federal farm loan act increasing the loan limit of Federal land banks on land from $10,000 to $25,000.

3. Amendment of the Federal reserve act to permit rediscount by member banks of live stock and agricultural paper having a maturity of nine months.

4. Amendment of the Federal reserve act to authorize Federal reserve banks to buy and sell debentures issued by farm-credit departments of Federal land banks: Be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of Agriculture, and all Members of Congress from Texas and adjoining States.

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President—

Mr. DIAL. I should like to ask the Senator one question, please.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator wait until I get up the appropriation bill?

Mr. DIAL. Very well.

Mr. WARREN. With the permission of the Senator, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 13926, the legislative appropriation bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, the bill was reported only this morning.

Mr. WARREN. It was.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not want to raise an objection to considering appropriation bills, but I have not been able to get a print of the bill.

Mr. WARREN. It is right here.

Mr. FLETCHER. Under the rules, of course, it would have to lie over until to-morrow; and I suggest to the Senator whether it would not be better to bring it up to-morrow.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I want to say this:

In the first place, there are very few changes in the bill on the part of the Senate committee—none of great consequence. The bill has an increase altogether of $101,000. Three items, amounting to over $100,000, are for the Architect of the Capitol for doing over to some extent this Chamber and for providing other conveniences of two or three natures in the Senate Office Building. Aside from that, there is a little matter of doing away with one or two employments and adding a trifle to the pay of three or four more. That is about all there is in the bill except what comes over from the House—the regular appropriations for the clerks of committees and employees of the Senate, and so forth.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have not any doubt about the merits of the bill and the merits of the amendments that have been offered to it. It is just a question in my own mind as to whether we ought not to wait until to-morrow morning to take it up.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator would accommodate the committee very much if he would let the bill be taken up now, notwithstanding it was only reported to-day. I realize that this is the first time that I have asked for such action in this session. It is a matter of small moment in one way, but it is quite important to us because there are so many conferences that are yet uncompleted.

Mr. FLETCHER. So far as I am concerned, then, I shall not raise the objection. I do think that these bills ought at least to be presented so as to let us have a print of the bill before we take it up.

Mr. WARREN. I ask that the Senator may be furnished a copy of the bill, or any other Senator that wishes it. They are here.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wyoming? The Chair hears none.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 13926) making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. WARREN. I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that it may be read for amendment, the committee amendments to be first considered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

FIVE-CENT STREET-CAR FARES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, just after I had addressed the Senate briefly to-day upon the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKellar] to establish a 5-cent fare on the street cars in the District of Columbia, and had gone down to lunch, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Lenroot] said:

The Senator from Alabama very truly said that if the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee had been adopted it would have had the effect of legislating a 5-cent fare in the District of Columbia, if I correctly understood him. That was exactly the position the majority on this side took with reference to that amendment. My position with reference to it was that it was legislation, that it did seek to have Congress fix the rate of fare in the District of Columbia.

Mr. McKellar. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. Lenroot. Certainly.

Mr. McKellar. Am I to understand the Senator to say that he is not in favor of a 5-cent fare in the District of Columbia?

Mr. Lenroot. I am in favor of a 5-cent fare if a 5-cent fare can constitutionally be imposed in the District of Columbia, but the Senator from Tennessee does not know, nor do I know, whether that can be done.

Mr. President, the only point I wish to make is that the entire speech of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. Hefflin] sustained the position taken by the majority, because we have a rule in this body that legislation can not be placed upon an appropriation bill. That is all I care to say with reference to it. The Senator from Alabama in his speech fully sustained, although he did not realize it, the position taken by the majority.

Mr. President, two years ago, I believe, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. Harrison] offered practically the same amendment, having in view the same purpose of obtaining for the people of the District of Columbia a 5-cent fare. The Senator from New York [Mr. Wadsworth], the same Senator who made the point of order to-day, made a point of order against that amendment. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Lenroot] defended the position taken by the Senator from Mississippi, and here is what the Senator then said about legislation on an appropriation bill:

I think the Senator is mistaken—

He was referring to the Senator from Washington [Mr. Jones]—

There is no such rule in the House. The limitation rule applies upon general principles, that a limitation does not change existing law, that a limitation upon an appropriation is not either new or general legislation.

So the position of the Senator from Wisconsin to-day is directly opposed to the position of the Senator from Wisconsin two years ago. The position that the Senator took two years ago is diametrically opposed to the position the Senator takes here to-day.

The Senator says that he is in favor of a 5-cent fare, and to-day he had the opportunity to vote for a 5-cent fare and he did not do it. The Chair ruled to-day exactly in keeping with the Senator's position two years ago. If the Senator had wanted to give a 5-cent fare to the people of the District of Columbia, what an easy thing it would have been to be consistent, stand by the position he occupied then, give the people of the District of Columbia the benefit of his great service, and vote to give a 5-cent fare to them. Here was the opportunity. Here was the amendment, the same kind of an amendment that was pending then, when he said it was in order. He says he favors it now, and yet he voted against putting it into the law when the Republican Vice President threw open the door and gave him the opportunity to vote to put it into the law.

Mr. President, I believe I find here, if my eyes do not deceive me, that he voted against a 5-cent fare two years ago. Here is a record vote that was about to escape me. Now the Senator says he is in favor of a 5-cent fare, but he voted against it then, although sustaining the position of the Senator from Mississippi that the matter was in order upon that occasion.

I want to bring to the attention of the Senate a proposition under this amendment that we tried to put on here to-day. The people of the District of Columbia, thousands of them, can ill afford to pay an 8-cent fare. Under the amendment proposed by a Democrat, the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKellar], the same kind of an amendment that was proposed by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. Harrison] two years ago, any person could buy 24 tickets for a dollar and ride 24 times in the District of Columbia under the fair and just provision that we undertook to put into the law to-day; but under the law as the majority of the Senate decreed to-day it shall be, any person riding 24 times and paying a cash fare each time will pay $1.92. So that is the effect of the vote cast by the Senator from Wisconsin and the others who voted with him. I called attention this morning to the fact that some of our good friends who are going out of the Senate defeated a 5-cent fare for the people of the District of Columbia—six of them—the Senator from New York [Mr. Calder], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. Frelinghuysen], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. Kellogg], the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCumber], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. New], and the Senator from Washington [Mr. Poindexter].

Mr. President, we are treated to this sort of a situation: Nearly everyone admits that an 8-cent fare is too much.

I want to see justice done to the people of the District, and it is wrong for these capitalists to come here from the outside States, buy stock in these street car companies, and hold the fares up on the people of this District. Congress should not permit it. But here we are to-day, desiring to reduce the fares, which nearly everybody says ought to be reduced, and the Republican Senators, with the opportunity given them by the Republican Vice President to reduce these fares to 5 cents, or six tickets for a quarter, did not do it. They defeated it. They had the opportunity to put that amendment on the bill. Then they stand up and say, "We were just voting to sustain the rule."

Mr. President, how many times have I seen both parties turn down a rule because an emergency had arisen, and the exigencies of the occasion demanded that the rule be set aside temporarily? The same body that makes a rule can temporarily suspend it or lay it aside by its vote, and that is what we do when we do not sustain a rule. When a majority of the Senate wants to do a thing, and thinks it is right to do it, it frequently turns down the ruling of the Chair, if he rules against the position the Senate takes in its desire to accomplish a certain thing. So Senators can not hide behind that. The issue is straight. The street car companies and those who own stock in them did not want the 8-cent fare reduced, and they triumphed in the vote here this morning. Those who wanted 5-cent fares, six tickets for a quarter, were defeated under the vote here this morning. Let the record speak the truth.

Senators can not say they are for 5-cent fares and then vote against a provision that gives 5-cent fares. It is inconsistent. If I am for 5-cent fares I will vote for 5-cent fares. If I am told that such an amendment ought not to be put on this bill and I see that it is the only chance I have to make it the law, I will vote to put it on the bill. Such things have been done hundreds and hundreds of times in both branches of Congress during my service in them.

Mr. President, the statement of Senators will not hold water that they are in favor of bringing down this high fare in the Capital of the Nation when at the same time they vote against the opportunity to bring it down. It is simply ridiculous.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I rise simply to call attention to the fact that the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Lenroot] happens at the moment not to be in his seat, having been called from the Chamber. I do not wish to appear to inject myself into any controversy between him and the distinguished and able Senator from Alabama, because the Senator from Wisconsin if he were here would be amply able to take care of himself.

Mr. HEFLIN. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILLIS. Certainly.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator is aware of the fact that the Senator from Wisconsin replied to my speech when I was not in the Chamber.

Mr. WILLIS. I was not aware of that fact.

Mr. HEFLIN. That is a fact.

Mr. WILLIS. It is not a matter of criticism on either side, so far as that is concerned. It is not the business of a Senator to see that somebody else is present. I am not criticizing the Senator from Alabama. I am simply calling attention to the fact, and also to this fact: Notwithstanding the two eloquent addresses made by my friend from Alabama, he knows, and every other Member of the Senate knows, that the question he has been talking about was not before the Senate this morning and was not acted upon by the Senate.

The rule is perfectly clear. It was not a question of 5-cent fares that we passed upon. The rule reads:

No amendment which proposes general legislation shall be received to any general appropriation bill.

That is a rule of the Senate, and all the Senate did was to say that it would stand by its rule. I do not know how Senators would vote if the question of 5-cent fares were before them, but I simply want the country to understand that which the Senator from Alabama perfectly well understands, that that question was not before the Senate, but it was simply a question as to whether or not the Senate would stand by the rules which it has made.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, this morning the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee was pending. The Chair ruled that it was in order. That proposed amendment reads:

Provided, That the appropriation in this section shall not become available until the Public Utilities Commission shall fix rates of fare for the street railway companies in the District of Columbia at rates not in excess of the rate of fare fixed in existing charters or contracts heretofore entered into between said companies and the Congress, and on and after February 1, 1923, said companies shall receive a rate of fare not exceeding 5 cents per passenger, and six tickets shall be sold for 25 cents.

The latter part, the last three lines, were stricken out upon his request, but the other part refers to the same thing which was in the law as it existed heretofore, when they had 5-cent fares.

The eloquent and distinguished Senator from the State of Ohio, my good friend Mr. WILLIS, says this question was not up. Oh, Mr. President, how hair-splitting is the distinguished Senator from Ohio. This question not up? Here is the amendment providing for this very thing. The question was, Is the amendment in order? The Vice President said, "It is in order. It puts a limitation on an appropriation bill." Is it to be said that we can not limit appropriations and say specifically what shall or shall not be done with the people's money—under what conditions it shall be expended? That is an indefensible proposition. No such position as that can be defended from any standpoint.

The Senate can say that so much of the money "is appropriated to build a street car track down Pennsylvania Avenue to a certain point, provided the street car company will build the street car line from the Avenue to F Street; and unless the street car company does build such line, none of this money appropriated by the Government shall be used in building the track down the Avenue."

Does anybody mean to say that that can not be done, that we could not put a limitation like that in a law? I venture to say that no good parliamentarian will say so. This amendment said, in effect, here are appropriations made for the District of Columbia. The street car companies are part of the District of Columbia, and this money shall not be used until the Public Utilities Commission brings the fare down from the ridiculously high point which it has reached to 5 cents, as it was in the better and brighter days of the District.

Then they undertake to say that is not in order, that you can not put that sort of limitation upon an appropriation bill. The precedents show it can be done. The Senator from Mississippi pointed out the precedents to-day. The Vice President properly ruled, under the precedents of the Senate, that it could be done; but Senators on the other side voted to override the precedents of the Senate, to deny the Senate the right to vote as to whether or not we should have 5-cent fares.

Of course that was the question up for consideration. What else was under consideration in the Senate? We were not trying to remove the Capitol. We were not trying to remove the Union Depot. We were trying to reduce the fares on the street car lines. That was up for consideration in the Senate.

The Senator from Ohio says "Why, we did not even have that question up." Mr. President, that 5-cent fare question was standing here looking at us, and so were some of the stockholders of the street car companies, and so were some of the poor people who have to ride on the street cars in this city looking down on this Chamber, anxiously hoping street car fares would be reduced, so that it would be a little help to their slender purses. But those who have stock in the railroad companies of this city triumphed, and those who have to ride and pay, with nobody to speak for them, lost on the vote.

That is the issue. There was nothing else up but that. Some Senators may now begin to see how this issue is going to look at home, when they had an opportunity to vote to bring down the street car fares of this city, this city beautiful, the Capital City of the Nation, where, when our people come from the various States, they are entitled to ride over it at a fair fee to the street car companies. We had an opportunity to bring the fare down to 5 cents, which is the fare paid in New York City, but the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] made a point of order against it before, and he made it this time; and his colleague, my good friend Mr. CALDER, who is going out, with others who are going out, by their votes denied the people of the District of Columbia to-day the right to enjoy a 5-cent fare, or six tickets for a quarter.

Mr. SMOOT. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. HEFLIN. Just a moment.

Mr. SMOOT. I just want to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. HEFLIN. I find by the Record that when this question was held in order my good friend from Ohio voted against 5-cent fares, and no wonder he now comes to the rescue of the Senator from Wisconsin. The Bible says, "By their fruits ye shall know them." They were both against 5-cent fares. They were for these high rates. They so voted then, and they so voted to-day. So there is no use trying to camouflage. They can not get around the issue. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I was just going to ask the Senator whether the street car fare in Alabama is 5 cents, or is it higher?

Mr. HEFLIN. In New York City it is 5 cents.

Mr. SMOOT. I am speaking of the Senator's State—Alabama. Is the street car fare in Alabama 5 cents to-day?

Mr. HEFLIN. I do not know what it is.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator does not think it is 5 cents, does he?

Mr. HEFLIN. I guess it is about 5.

Mr. SMOOT. I guess it is more than 5, I want to say to the Senator.

Mr. HEFLIN. We will set them a good example if we will vote here to-day to make the fare 5 cents.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I would be perfectly willing to vote for a 5-cent fare if that would be just compensation. The Senator knows very well that when the 5-cent fare was in force salaries were lower than they are to-day, all expenses were lower, everything was lower. Not only that, but the fare in the District is not 8 cents; it is 6½ cents.

Mr. HEFLIN. Where is that?

Mr. SMOOT. The fare is 6½ cents.

Mr. HEFLIN. Where?

Mr. SMOOT. In the District of Columbia.

Mr. HEFLIN. I have many a time seen a boy or girl, a man or a woman, get on the street car and not have the money to buy 40 cents' worth of tokens, and have to pay 8 cents.

Mr. SMOOT. Not 1 out of 5,000 pays the fare that way.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator is mistaken.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator to look at the record and see what it shows.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Utah a question, if the Senator from Alabama will yield.

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Can the Senator lay his finger on any statute that authorizes the Public Utilities Commission of Washington to fix a fare bringing a reasonable income to the street car companies? I believe I asked the Senator that question before. I know it has been stated frequently that that is the law. I have just looked up the public utilities act, and that act in no place authorizes the Public Utilities Commission to fix a fare that will bring a reasonable income to the street car companies. Unless some amendment to that act has been passed, which has not been brought to my attention, apparently they are acting wholly without authority. It was acquiesced in simply, as I apprehend, because of war conditions. Now that the war conditions are over they ought to discontinue acting without authority.

Mr. SMOOT. I have not the act with me, and I do not know what the particular wording of the act is, but I am quite sure if there was an increase by the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia and it did not meet the approval of the public generally there would have been some action at least to prevent them from putting the increase into effect.

Mr. McKELLAR. We are trying to get some action now.

Mr. SMOOT. I am speaking of court action, not congressional action.

Mr. McKELLAR. Sometimes the people object very strenuously to bringing court action when the public authorities act in that regard.

Mr. SMOOT. I have not any doubt but what the commission had the authority.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator can refer me to the authority—and I know if anybody knows where it is to be found the Senator from Utah does—I would be very glad to submit it to the Senate. I can not find any such authority. It may be I have not examined with sufficient care, but up to date I have been unable to find it.

Mr. HEFLIN. I believe the Senator from Utah was against the proposition this morning. I would like to ask the Senator from Utah if he believes in a 5-cent fare in the District of Columbia?

Mr. SMOOT. Not if it will not pay the expenses of running the street car company. I know in my own city they are charging 7 cents and making nothing.

Mr. HEFLIN. I want the street car companies treated fairly. What about the poor fellow who has to ride on the street car? Does not the Senator give consideration to his purse?

Mr. SMOOT. The consideration given him is that if the company does not pay the expenses of operation, then the poor fellow will not have anything to ride on very long.

Mr. HEFLIN. The poor fellow who is not able to pay 8 cents fare would be just as well off if we had no street cars.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true. So he would be just as well off in the one case as the other.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President—

Mr. HEFLIN. It is apparent that the Senator is trying—

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President—

Mr. WARREN. Will all of the Senators yield to me a moment?

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to ask the Senator from Utah a question before he leaves the Chamber.

Mr. WARREN. All of these discussions are very illuminating, but I was wondering whether we should indulge in them when we have an appropriation bill before the Senate?

Mr. McKELLAR. I am doing it for the simple reason, if the Senator addresses his inquiry to me, that so far as I am concerned I regard a 5-cent fare in the District of Columbia as quite important, sufficiently important for the Members of this body to discuss it.

Mr. WARREN. Has the Senator from Tennessee made a motion to put such a provision in the pending appropriation bill?

Mr. McKELLAR. No; there is no motion, and under the rules of the Senate there does not have to be a motion on it.

Mr. WARREN. I understand the rules of the Senate allow the Senator to stand here for four days and talk if he has the strength to do it. I understand that perfectly well.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course, where it is a matter of such importance we ought to stand here and talk about it. When the law is violated in behalf of the street car companies, somebody ought to stand here and talk about it. The Senator from Utah [Mr. Smoot] stated he was in favor of a 5-cent fare, provided a reasonable return was given the street car companies. I called the attention of the Senator to the fact this morning, and I do it again now, and I have no doubt the Senator knows it, that the Capital Traction Co., which was allowed to charge these high fares in the city of Washington, last year paid a dividend of 7 per cent and had a surplus of in the neighborhood of $700,000, almost enough to pay 6 per cent more. Surely the Senator has no doubt about that being even more than a fair return, has he?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator has no doubt that the 1½ cents off of every fare, which the Senator proposes to deduct in order to reduce the fares to 5 cents, would amount to more than the $700,000, and perhaps three or four times that amount.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is not what I am asking.

Mr. SMOOT. That is exactly the fact. The Senator from Tennessee has not studied the question to understand what it means.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am asking if the Senator does not think that any concern able to pay a dividend of 7 per cent is making a very fair return on its money?

Mr. SMOOT. I should consider that a very fair return.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator would not fix 7 per cent as an unfair return if he were fixing it, would he?

Mr. SMOOT. He is not fixing it at 7 cents. Six and two-thirds cents is the rate at which it is fixed now.

Mr. McKELLAR. But I am not talking about the fare. I am talking about the amount earned on the capital stock of the company. They paid a dividend of 7 per cent last year, and 7 per cent the year before, and, as I understand it, they said they did not care for the increased rates. Is the Senator in favor of granting them an increased rate whether they want it or not, and regardless of the fair return on the capital?

Mr. SMOOT. No; the Senator is not in favor of that. I think the Senator from Tennessee will find that the other company in Washington has not made any money at all on the rates of fare it has charged.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; and the Senator will find that there are people in Washington who do not make money, of course; but we can not fix rates for those who are unable to make money on their property. We can not overcome their delinquencies. I understand that the Washington Railway & Electric Co. is largely a speculative concern; that they have been engaged in getting corporations together at small prices whenever they could and then issuing large blocks of stock with nothing to represent it but pure water. Of course we ought not to be required to tax the people in the city of Washington in order to give that company even what might be called a fair return upon money that they have not got invested in the business.

Mr. SMOOT. Let me ask the Senator a question. Suppose a reduction of 1½ cents in every fare received by the Capital Traction Co. should result in decreasing the revenues of the company by an amount greater than that required to pay the 7 per cent dividend and create the $700,000 surplus, would the Senator then want a 5-cent fare?

Mr. McKELLAR. That is a supposition that we need not go into, for the reason—

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, yes; that ought to be taken into consideration.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is not the criterion by which the matter should be judged at all. We judge by what they are earning to-day. They are earning in the neighborhood of 13 per cent. That is too much to tax the people in the District of Columbia to give to the street car companies.

Mr. SMOOT. But the 1½ cents which the Senator wants to take off of the rate of fare in the District of Columbia would amount to more than the dividend and the surplus he is talking about.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator is entirely mistaken about that.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no; I am not.

Mr. McKELLAR. Because before the fare was increased the companies earned good return upon their stock and as much as they were entitled to earn under the contract they had with the city. So it is proved that the Senator's figures are absolutely wrong.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not desire to discuss the matter any further with the Senator.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, it has been hinted that the street car companies have a good deal of watered stock. When they used to sell six tickets for a quarter they made money. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKellar] has pointed out that they are making about 13 per cent on their investment with the tremendous earning power they have under the present law. They used to get along with a 5-cent fare, and the people used to get along fairly well under it; but they have been increased until they pay now, as I said a moment ago, every time they pay a cash fare—not 40 cents' worth of tickets—8 cents for every ride they take. It is wrong. The fares ought to be reduced to 5 cents.

I simply rose to reply to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Lenroot], who said that Senators voted against the 5-cent rate, but I think he voted at that time to sustain the Chair in his ruling that the amendment would be in order. The position he occupied to-day with regard to that is at cross-purposes with the position he occupied then; but his vote to-day, I repeat in conclusion, is in accord with the vote he cast then, because he voted against the 5-cent fare on that occasion. All Senators on the other side of the Chamber who voted to-day to override the ruling of the Chair can not get away from the fact that they voted in that situation to defeat a 5-cent fare for the District of Columbia. The street car companies carry many more passengers now than they did when they used to make 6 and 6½ per cent. I understand there is a lot of watered stock in the business now.

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13926) making appropriations for the legislative branches of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes.

The Assistant Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head "Senate, office of the Secretary," on page 2, line 16, to increase the salary of the Assistant Secretary, Henry M. Rose, from "$5,000" to "$5,500."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 18, to increase the salary of the minute and Journal clerk from "$3,000" to "$3,600."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, in the items for office of Secretary of the Senate, at the beginning of line 2, to strike out "messenger, $1,440."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, at the end of line 4, to reduce the appropriation for salaries in the office of the Secretary of the Senate from "$89,850" to "$89,510."

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading was continued to line 15 on page 3.

Mr. WARREN. At this point I wish to offer an amendment. On page 3, line 14, the committee proposes to amend by striking out "$1,500" and inserting "$1,800."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 3, line 14, strike out "$1,500" and insert "$1,800," so as to read:

Three assistant clerks, at $1,800 each.

Mr. FLETCHER. Was that estimated for?

Mr. WARREN. There is no estimate necessary so far as this bill is concerned.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. On page 3, line 15, I propose another amendment, to strike out "$900" and insert "$1,200."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 3, line 15, strike out "$900" and insert "$1,200," so as to read:

Messenger, $1,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. Before going further I ask unanimous consent that the clerks at the desk may change all totals to correspond with the amendments when we are through with the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The reading of the bill was continued to page 4, line 1.

Mr. WARREN. On page 4, line 1, I move to amend by striking out "$1,800" and inserting "$2,220."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 4, line 1, strike out "$1,800" and insert "$2,220," so as to read:

Assistant clerk, $2,220.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. On the same page, in line 17, I move to amend by striking out "$2,500" and inserting "$3,000."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 4, line 17, strike out "$2,500" and insert "$3,000," so as to read:

Interstate Commerce—clerk, $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Clerical assistance to Senators," on page 6, after line 12, to insert:

Senators elected, whose term of office begins on the 4th day of March, and whose credentials in due form of law shall have been presented to the Senate, or filed with the Secretary thereof, are authorized to appoint the same number of clerical assistants, not to exceed four, at the same annual salaries, to which qualified Senators, not chairmen of committees, are entitled, whose compensation shall be paid out of the appropriation for clerical assistance to Senators.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Office of Sergeant at Arms and Doorkeeper," on page 6, at the beginning of line 26, to strike out "Assistant Sergeant at Arms, $2,500."

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, the position referred to in the amendment is filled by a man recommended by me. He is most efficient. He has held the position for the past four years. Of course, I have no notion as to what may happen to him in the future. He has, however, been very helpful in many ways. I do not know the reason why the committee has recommended that the position be abolished. It has existed to my knowledge for the past eight years.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. CALDER. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. Without entering into the merits of the officer or clerk referred to, for I do not know him personally nor am I familiar with his duties, the office was created at the time when Sergeant at Arms Ransdell was very ill and not able to attend to his duties. There was then a man who had been here a long time, by the name of Cornelius, for whom the office was created for the time being, and has been perpetuated since. The position was continued during the time when Mr. Higgins was Sergeant at Arms of the Senate and was filled subsequently on the recommendation of the Senator from New York, as he has stated.

Mr. CALDER. At any rate, I know the office has been filled for eight years, and for the past four years it has been very efficiently filled. The man who has held the position has been exceedingly useful to many Members of the Senate, and I am confident it would be a distinct loss to the permanent staff of the Senate if the position should be abolished. Of course, after I leave the Senate I do not know whether or not the present incumbent will be retained, but my judgment is that the office should not be abolished.

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator from New York that in any event the office will remain in existence until the 1st of July next.

Mr. CALDER. I understand that even if the amendment shall be agreed to the man who holds the office will continue in office until the 1st of July next.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the Senator from New York if the office which is now sought to be abolished is the one held by Mr. Woodworth?

Mr. CALDER. It is.

Mr. HARRISON. My observation of Mr. Woodworth is that he is a most efficient and capable employee.

Mr. CALDER. I know that he is, and I therefore hope the committee amendment may not prevail.

Mr. McKELLAR. I wish to make the same statement in reference to Mr. Woodworth as has been made by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON]. I know Mr. Woodworth well. He is an efficient employee, and I hope the Senate will retain him.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I do not wish to enter into a discussion of this matter, but, as has been stated by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], this office was created a number of years ago in an emergency. We are advised, however, that the office of the Sergeant at Arms may be conducted very well without this additional help. I know the officer who at present occupies the place, and I know he has been capable and efficient, but if the office of the Sergeant at Arms may be run without the additional help, if we have an office here which is not needed, as has been ascertained in this instance, we, inasmuch as we are making an effort to reduce expenses, ought to be willing to begin to reduce them here in the Senate. So the committee have stricken the item from the bill, and I think the Senate ought to stand by the committee and reduce expenses to that extent in our own body.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Kansas is entirely right. It is not a question of our personal friendship at all; it is a question of reducing appropriations because the salary heretofore paid for the place has become unnecessary. I think the amendment should be adopted.

Mr. CALDER. Just another word. I know of no more useful place in the staff of this body than the one occupied by Mr. Woodworth, and I hope that the committee amendment will not prevail.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, there is one thought which occurs to me, and that is if the effort is to be made to pass a ship subsidy bill and to keep Senators here to do it and they are to be forced to vote for such an obnoxious measure and it shall fail at this session and an extraordinary session be called, there will not only have to be a Sergeant at Arms but two or three Assistant Sergeants at Arms to bring Senators here in order to pass such a bill.

Mr. CURTIS. We shall take our chances on that, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. CALDER. I ask for a division, Mr. President.

The question being put, on a division the amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 7, line 4, to increase the number of messengers at $1,800 each under the office of Sergeant at Arms and Doorkeeper from "37" to "38."

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, on page 7, line 4, of the bill I notice the words "including one for minority."

Mr. WARREN. May I say to the Senator from Arizona that there are two of those messengers for the minority, one having a certain salary and the other a somewhat lower salary.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I received a letter from a constituent about a month ago stating that he desired me to procure a position about the Senate as messenger or page or elevator operator for one of his relatives, who was a worthy young man. I wrote him in reply that in 1919, when the Republicans took charge of the Senate, they, of course, also took all the positions commonly called "patronage" and that such patronage was at the disposal of the Republican Senators but not at the disposal of Democratic Senators. However, I am advised that 10 places or positions have been allotted as "patronage" to certain Democratic Senators. I had expected to introduce a resolution in the Democratic caucus asking who on this side of the Chamber has received patronage at the hands of the Republican Senators. I now ask to be informed as to what particular Democratic Senators have been given the right to appoint persons to positions about the Senate?

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. CURTIS. It is impossible for me to give the names, but it has been the custom in the Senate ever since I have been a Member of it to allow the minority certain patronage. That patronage is assigned to the minority side, and the patronage committee of the minority, I presume, disposes of it just as it is distributed on the majority side.

Mr. ASHURST. Who make the appointments? I desire the names. I expect ultimately to find out and I shall not be deflected in my pursuit of this information.

Mr. CURTIS. I can give the Senator the names of the employees, but, of course, not being a member of the Democratic Party and not attending their conferences and not being on their committees, I can not tell him who make the selections.

Mr. ASHURST. I am advised that a patronage committee has made the appointments and we desire a list of the names.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President—

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator looks around at me, and so I want to tell him that I am not one of them.

Mr. ASHURST. Very well. There is the first admission.

Mr. SMITH. What does the Senator want especially to know?

Mr. ASHURST. I have been informed that places or positions have been assigned to the Democratic minority. The Senator from South Carolina says he knows nothing about it.

I shall content myself for the present with what I have said. If the Democratic leader will submit to me the list of names I shall be content. I hope that those who have been frequently in the public eye denouncing the Republicans are not also those who have been receiving patronage at the hands of the Republicans.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 7, line 10, to increase the number of skilled laborers under the office of Sergeant at Arms and Doorkeeper from four to five.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, line 13, to increase the compensation of three female attendants in charge of ladies' retiring rooms from $720 to $1,000 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, line 17, after the figures "$650," to strike out "attendant for service in old library portion of the Capitol, $1,500."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, at the end of line 24, to reduce the total appropriation for the office of Sergeant at Arms and Doorkeeper from "$158,300" to "$157,580."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, line 22, after the words "Vice President," to insert "to be immediately available," so as to read:

For driving, maintenance, and operation of an automobile for the Vice President, to be immediately available, $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 21, line 10, after the word "third," to strike out "session" and insert "and fourth sessions," so as to read:

For preparation, under the direction of the Committees on Appropriations of the Senate and House of Representatives, of the statements for the third and fourth sessions of the Sixty-seventh Congress, showing appropriations made, new offices created, offices the salaries of which have been omitted, increased, or reduced, indefinite appropriations, and contracts authorized, together with a chronological history of the regular appropriation bills, as required by law, $4,000, to be paid to the persons designated by the chairmen of said committees to do the work.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Capitol Buildings and Grounds," on page 22, after line 17, to insert:

For special repairs to the Senate Chamber, including extension of ceiling skylight, painting, reconstruction of air chamber under floor, and for new flooring, to be immediately available, $81,385.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 23, after line 14, to insert:

For painting and renovating Senate Office Building, and for all purposes connected therewith, to be immediately available, $55,370.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 23, after line 17, to insert:

For 100 woven-iron storeroom cages, attic floor, Senate Office Building, to be immediately available, $16,180.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I inquire of the Senator what are contemplated by those two amendments, the first being for painting and renovating the Senate Office Building? Does that mean the outside of the building?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the chairman of the Committee on Rules is present, and I will ask him to explain that item.

Mr. CURTIS. As the Senator from Florida knows, the Senate Office Building has not been painted since it was erected. A number of Senators have come to me, as chairman of the Committee on Rules, and requested that I take such steps as might be necessary to have the rooms painted inside and such other painting done as could be done within the amount proposed to be appropriated. I asked for an estimate and received it, and the committee put in an appropriation to cover the amount. With that appropriation we want to have done as much painting as possibly can be done, and we hope to be able to finish the entire building, but the rooms will be painted inside first, so that the rooms of Senators will be repainted for the first time in 12 or 14 years.

Mr. FLETCHER. What is the meaning of the "woven-iron cages"?

Mr. CURTIS. I suppose the Senator knows that a great many of the Senators desire to keep their old letter files, and they desire space in which to put them. They now are in rooms from which we may be able to remove them to make additional rooms for Senators; and by putting steel cages in the attic we can have one for each Senator. That has been done in the House Office Building, and has proven very satisfactory. The Members of the House are greatly pleased with the accommodations that have been given them, and we thought we would give the Senators the same accommodations. There will be one for each Senator and four extra.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will continue the reading of the bill.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the subhead "Library Building," on page 33, line 17, after the word "one," where it occurs the first time, to strike out "$2,000" and insert "$2,250"; in line 24, before the word "each," to strike out "$480" and insert "$720"; and, on page 34, at the end of line 3, to strike out "$72,465" and insert "$73,195," so as to make the paragraph read:

Salaries: Administrative assistant and disbursing officer, $3,000; clerks—1 $2,250, 1 $1,600, 1 $1,400, 1 $1,000; property clerk, $900; messenger, $840; assistant messenger, $720; 3 telephone switchboard operators, at $720 each; captain of the watch, $1,400; 2 lieutenants of the watch, at $1,000 each; 22 watchmen, at $900 each; foremen of laborers, $900; 16 laborers, at $660 each; 2 book cleaners, at $720 each; laundress, $660; 2 attendants in ladies' room, at $720 each; 4 check boys, at $360 each; mistress of charwomen, $425; assistant mistress of charwomen, $300; 58 charwomen, at $240 each; 4 elevator conductors, at $720 each; 3 skilled laborers, at $720 each; in all, $73,195.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I have an amendment on the part of the committee to add to the language which appears on page 34, lines 15 and 16.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 34, lines 15 and 16, it is proposed to strike out "Cashier and paymaster, $2,500" and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

disbursing clerk, $2,500: Provided, That the disbursing clerk of the Government Printing Office hereafter shall be charged with the receipt and disbursement of all moneys for said office in accordance with the provisions of law relating to the Public Printer and other disbursing officers of the Government, under such bond and rules as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe; and thereafter the Public Printer shall give a bond in the sum of $25,000 for the faithful performance of his duties.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, on page 34, line 11, following "Government Printing Office," I offer on behalf of the committee the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 34, after line 12, subhead "Office of Public Printer," it is proposed to insert the following:

The Public Printer may hereafter employ such number of apprentices as in his judgment will be consistent with the economical service of the office.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, my attention was temporarily distracted a minute ago. Will the Senator state what that amendment is? I beg his pardon for asking him to repeat it.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I will read the amendment to the Senator and then explain briefly what it is for.

The amendment reads:

The Public Printer may hereafter employ such number of apprentices as in his judgment will be consistent with the economical service of the office.

The provision of the printing act of 1895, Twenty-eighth Statutes, page 608, reads as follows:

The Public Printer may employ such number of apprentices, not to exceed 25 at any one time, as in his judgment will be consistent with the economical service of the office.

Mr. McKELLAR. Is there a limitation put upon this provision?

Mr. SMOOT. There is no limitation put upon this.

Mr. McKELLAR. Are they to be under the civil service?

Mr. SMOOT. They are all under the civil service.

Mr. McKELLAR. Are they required to be under the civil service?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. Would it not be better for the Senator to put some limitation upon them?

Mr. SMOOT. All of the employees of the Government Printing Office are under the civil service.

Mr. McKELLAR. But would it not be better to put a limitation on the number, instead of just giving the Public Printer an unrestricted right to appoint as many as he wants?

Mr. SMOOT. No. I will say to the Senator that if the Government Printing Office had the same proportion of apprentices that the labor organizations of the country allow in all of the work in which they have an interest there would be over 400 of them now in the Government Printing Office. This limit of 25 was made at a time when the number was very much smaller. I thought the statement of the Public Printer stated the exact number, but he says:

At that time—

That is, at the time of the passage of the law to which I have referred, in 1895—

there were a comparatively small number of employees in the Printing Office, a few hundred, as compared with the 4,000 and over now.

Mr. McKELLAR. And how many apprentices are there—only 25?

Mr. SMOOT. There is a limit of 25. I want to state to the Senator that they have the training of apprentices in the Government Printing Office, and they have complete four-year courses. The first period of the printing course is one month and the second period is so many months. There are 12 periods covering the four-year course. Then they have the pressman's course there, and the next course is the platemaker's course, and the bookbinder's course, and the machinist's course.

Mr. McKELLAR. What rate of pay do they get?

Mr. SMOOT. It is right in the office itself. They take the boys that have come in there and worked around and made themselves proficient and want to learn the trade, and they have that course to educate them, so that they go right in and take places in the office as they become vacant.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I ask the Senator a question? Does he not give an opportunity for some of the ex-service men to be trained here?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. FLETCHER. So that it relieves the vocational training work?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes. There is not a better place in the world to train any of the ex-soldiers than right in that office, and that is what we want to do.

Mr. FLETCHER. In reference to the amount of pay, I think usually they get about 25 cents an hour, which is, of course, very much less than the full pay.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

INTERALLIED DEBTS AND GERMAN REPARATIONS.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Record some very interesting information. Here is a letter which I have received from the president of the Southern Commercial Congress which explains the matter. The letter states that—

The Southern Commercial Congress organized an International Trade Commission, representative of all sections of the United States. Investigations were made in France, Belgium, Holland, Germany, Switzerland, Italy, and Great Britain.

The commission was nonpartisan, its membership being about evenly divided between our two great political parties.

Herewith I am sending you a copy of the preliminary report; the complete report with a digest of the conditions in the various countries visited by the commission; a set of amortization tables given as a suggested basis for the settlement of the interallied debts and the German reparations, together with letters from members of the American and British commissions and a copy of the resolutions adopted by the Southern Commercial Congress at the fifteenth annual convention held at Chicago, Ill., December 20-22, 1922.

This material is respectfully submitted for the information of the public, and is delivered to you, with the request that you present it for publication in the RECORD or as a separate congressional document for the information of the American people.

I have here a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, one from the Secretary of State, and one from Hon. Stanley Baldwin, British debt commissioner. The matter is not very long. It is information which this commission procured in Europe. I do not vouch for it; I would not offer it except I know the character of the men who obtained the information; and the public is entitled to read it for what it is worth. So I ask unanimous consent to have it inserted in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

(Letter from Hon. A. W. Mellon, Secretary of the Treasury.)

NOVEMBER 4, 1922.

CLARENCE J. OWENS, Esq.,

President the Southern Commercial Congress,
Southern Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I beg to acknowledge your letter of October 31 inclosing copy of the preliminary report of the International Trade Commission which was assembled by the Southern Commercial Congress.

I note that a copy of the final report will be sent immediately after November 20, when it is to be released.

I also note your offer to send a complete report as to a plan of amortization, and beg to say that I should be glad to receive the same. Thanking you, believe me, yours very truly,

A. W. MELLON, Secretary.

(Letter from Hon. Charles E. Hughes, Secretary of State.)

NOVEMBER 14, 1922.

Mr. CLARENCE J. OWENS,

President the Southern Commercial Congress,
Southern Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. OWENS: I regret that on account of the pressure of work in the department I have been unable before this to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of October 31, inclosing a copy of the preliminary report of the International Trade Commission assembled by the Southern Commercial Congress. I am deeply interested in the important subjects to which this report refers, and I appreciate your courtesy in sending me a copy.

Sincerely yours,

CHARLES E. HUGHES.

(Letter from the Hon. Stanley Baldwin, Chancellor of the Exchequer and chairman of the British mission of Great Britain to the United States.)

SHOREHAM HOTEL,
Washington, January 15, 1923.

Mr. CLARENCE J. OWENS,

DEAR MR. OWENS: I am very grateful to you for being so good as to furnish me with a copy of the preliminary report of the International Trade Commission of the Southern Commercial Congress, together with amortization tables for the payment of the debts of nations, including German reparations.

I should like at once to express my admiration of the careful research and mature thought which have been brought to bear upon questions of great intricacy and difficulty.

It was a great pleasure to me to have the honor of a conference with you and the advantage of being favored with the impressions you have derived as a result of your extended tour in the Continent of Europe.

Yours sincerely,

STANLEY BALDWIN.

PRELIMINARY REPORT OF THE INTERNATIONAL TRADE COMMISSION.

The International Trade Commission assembled by the Southern Commercial Congress has returned to the United States after an extended tour of inspection in Great Britain, France, Belgium, Holland, Germany, Switzerland, and Italy.

Courtesies were invoked for the commission by the State Department and the Department of Commerce of the United States, and every facility was granted for the successful prosecution of the work by the agencies of the United States in the countries visited and by the governmental and business organizations and offices of these countries.

The commission is preparing a comprehensive report for presentation to the Fifteenth Annual Convention of the Southern Commercial Congress, to be held in Chicago, November 20 to 22, and for presentation to the Congress of the United States in December. The report will be offered for publication by Congress for the information of the American people.

The American commission assembled by the Southern Commercial Congress in 1913 submitted a report on which was based the Federal farm loan act, and the commission will in the present report submit clear-cut recommendations, the result of first-hand observations, on the fundamental problems in the international relations that react as barriers to direct trade and financial intercourse.

The commission has divorced its work absolutely from national and international politics, and without fear or favor has sought to view the problems and suggest the remedies with an eye single to the economic betterment of the world, the extension of American business, and the sane reconstruction of the stricken nations of Europe.

As a preliminary statement the commission has authorized a brief announcement of conclusions on the fundamental problems that in each country was found to be the absolute barrier that must be removed before the minor questions will admit of solution. The statement, adopted unanimously, is as follows:

"Notwithstanding the treaty of Versailles and the low economic stature of European nations, Europe is more nearly on the verge of military conflict than at any period immediately preceding the World War.

"The Belgian compromise is purely temporary, and unless some solution of the problems is reached prior to the expiration of the six months' period the conditions in Europe will be infinitely worse.

"The fundamental problem is that of the settlement of the war debts and reparations. The settlement can not be handled piecemeal, but must include all the nations parties to international financial obligations. America, as a creditor nation to the amount of $10,000,000,000 plus accrued interest, must see that its interests are protected in the contract of settlement.

"France and Belgium base their entire program of reconstruction and rehabilitation and the return of exchange to an approximate normal status upon German reparation payments. They say, 'Germany must pay.'

"Germany, with its gold and securities of value out of the country, with apparent financial collapse but with an almost frenzied agricultural and industrial activity in production, boldly claims that the treaty of Versailles must be amended that Germany may be free to compete economically and commercially with other countries of the world, and claims that 'Germany can not pay anything like the sum demanded nor at all until she is free to export.'

"Holland, as a neutral observer, agrees that Germany can not pay, and plainly says that the economic future of Holland is bound up with the fate of Germany. They say if Germany succeeds, Holland will prosper; if Germany fails, Holland will suffer.

"Italy has more nearly balanced her budget and England has balanced hers. These nations do not maintain that their economic future is dependent upon German reparations. However, both nations have their heavy exterior debts and both expect Germany to pay an adequate amount.

"If a settlement is reached, and a settlement must be reached if the peace of the world is to be restored and guaranteed, then two basic considerations must be understood and accepted, viz:

"1. America can not cancel the debts of the nations, but all nations must ultimately pay their obligations with dignity and honor.

"2. The World War is ended, and while hate and anger is still in the hearts of many, the settlements between nations formerly belligerent must be on a basis of mutual respect and consideration.

"Two words contain the solution of the world's problems in the international settlement in this hour of unhappy and chaotic uncertainty. They are 'moratorium' and 'amortization.' Let no nation ask for its debts to be forgiven, but only for time and patient consideration. The former Allies must pay the United States. Germany must pay reparations obligations, but amendments to the treaty of Versailles must be agreed upon giving Germany the opportunity of free competition economically with all nations, and France and Germany must have guarantees of freedom from molestation and military attack.

"If there was adequate reason for a six months' moratorium, there will be greater reason for a longer extension to the expiration of the period. A moratorium of a longer and absolutely definite period must be accepted. If America as a creditor nation attempts to force payments from the nations of Europe, the result would be disastrous, and if the former Allies attempt to force the defeated nations beyond the ability to pay, it would be equally disastrous and would inevitably lead to armed conflict.

"The nations must agree around the table to an amortization scheme of settlement. America might generously agree to reduce the interest rate lower than 4½ per cent and permit one-half of 1 per cent of the interest agreed upon to go to amortize the loan of $10,000,000,000, and thus with the payment of the interest and the amortization annually the debts would be eventually paid. It is evident that 25 years is altogether too brief a period to amortize the debts.

"The American farmer who under the Federal farm loan act gets his loan for 34½ years understands this principle, and Germany, the country that achieved most in building internal economic power prior to the World War, accomplished the result by the application of the amortization principle. Germany should be given the same opportunity to amortize the reparations as is extended to the countries of Europe by the United States and England in the settlement of the interrelated war debts. Close study of European finances indicates the need for a long amortization period and a low annual payment. It is the principle and not the rate that offers the solution.

"A standardized plan should be adopted speedily by all nations in conference. The plan should be based upon common sense and even justice. The program of disarmament with guarantees of peace would naturally be a vital element in the contract of settlement."

REPORT OF THE INTERNATIONAL TRADE COMMISSION.

At a conference in September in Berlin, where the American Trade Commission was studying economic and financial conditions, Doctor Bucher, managing director of the Great Federation of German Industries, said:

"Germany and England must export manufactures and import food and raw material. The United States has within itself all food and raw material that is needed."

Doctor Bucher spoke the truth but not all of the truth. The United States produces a surplus of agricultural products as well as manufactured goods which must find a foreign market. This surplus is comparatively small, but it figures in billions, and its economic effect must be considered.

The inability of many American farmers during the past two years to market their crops at a satisfactory profit, or even to secure a return covering the actual cost of production, is due to lack of a foreign market for our surplus products.

Upon applying to the Federal Government for comparative figures of exports of manufactures and agricultural products to total production the commission was advised as follows:

Unfortunately figures for production and foreign trade are not compiled on a comparable basis, and no figures are immediately available. One of the most carefully worked-out estimates, published by the Harvard Review of Economic Statistics, finds a percentage of exports to total production of exportable goods in 1909 of 7.9 per cent, 1914 of 8.5 per cent, and 1919 of 13.4 per cent. Another estimate made by Dr. B. M. Anderson shows figures of 9.3, 9.7, and 16.01 for the three years, respectively. These two estimates are supposed to include all commodities. A third estimate made by the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, based on 101 representative commodities, shows 4.07, 6, and 7.9 per cent, respectively. It can not be said that there is any one absolutely accurate ratio between domestic and foreign trade. The Harvard Review further figures that in the fiscal year 1920 we exported 45.6 per cent of our tobacco production, 39.3 per cent of copper, 32 per cent of cotton, 21.1 per cent of wheat, 17.5 per cent of pork, 10.6 per cent of beef, 5.7 per cent of anthracite coal, and 5.1 per cent of commercial automobiles. The value, in billions, of products, exports, and imports in 1909, 1914, and 1919 is as follows:

	1909	1914	1919
Agricultural crops.....	5.49	6.11	15.87
Animals and animal products.....	3.01	3.78	8.96
Minerals.....	1.89	2.12	4.65
Manufactured products.....	8.53	9.88	23.90
Exports.....	1.70	2.07	7.75
Imports.....	1.48	1.79	3.90

The Federal Reserve Bank of New York states that "despite the tremendous drop in both value and volume of our exports in 1921 the ratio to total production was actually greater not only than the notoriously 'boom' year previous, but also greater than any other year during the past generation. We did a better foreign business in 1921, a calamity year, than in any previous recent year—better probably than in any previous year." The bank shows a steadily increasing per cent of exports to production, from 4.47 per cent in 1910 to 6.10 in 1913, 6.52 in 1916, 7.91 in 1919, and 8.40 in 1920, with an increase of almost double in 1921.

These statistics also disprove the startling warning of James J. Hill, when he said in an address at Tacoma, Wash., in 1908:

"In 10 years there will not be a ship sail out of this harbor to cross the ocean. We shall have no flour and grain to ship; we shall be importing wheat; and in 25 years we shall face a nation-wide famine."

Although this address was declared by Sir Horace Plunkett, one of the leaders of agricultural thought among English-speaking people, "one of the most important speeches ever delivered by a public man upon a great public issue," it is obvious that world conditions and improvement in the methods of production and agricultural finance in the United States have very materially affected Mr. Hill's prophecy, or at least have deferred its realization. So far from facing a famine, the problem of the United States to-day is to find a satisfactory market for its surplus products.

The initial step, to follow recognition of a condition, is a first-hand, accurate collection of the facts, to be followed by a scientific study of the facts collected and all conditions at home and abroad that enter into the problem, in the certainty that out of it will come knowledge, and in the light of knowledge better conditions should follow.

Because of our failure to grasp trade opportunities to the South, Europe is the greatest available market for our surplus, and to make the necessary collection of the facts about European conditions by personal study the International Trade Commission was assembled by the Southern Commercial Congress.

The Southern Commercial Congress was organized in 1837 and for the past 14 years has maintained permanent headquarters at Washington. The slogan of the Congress is, "For a greater Nation through a greater South." Its activities have been nation-wide, and upon its invitation the governors and representative men in all branches of American business in the States of the North, East, and West have cooperated cordially.

In 1913 the Southern Commercial Congress organized an American commission on rural credit and agricultural organization, which at that time was the great problem the United States was facing and refusing to consider, composed of 118 men, 80 of them official delegates commissioned by governors of 29 States and premiers of 4 Canadian Provinces. This commission studied in every country in Europe except Portugal and the Balkan States, where war was then raging. Based upon its investigation and report there have been enacted many State laws for the benefit of the farmer, and the Federal farm loan act, under which there are in operation 12 great regional banks and more than 4,000 farm-loan associations, with loans of more than $800,000,000 to farmers on long time and low rate of interest on the amortization plan. This law has established in America the principle that 1 per cent added to the rate of interest will cancel the debt in 69 semiannual payments, or 34½ years.

General Pershing is responsible for the statement that when America entered the World War emergency legislation was required for the Army and Navy, for shipping, for practically every governmental activity, but the Federal farm loan act was already in operation and needed no further legislation to enable our farmers to produce food for our Army and Navy, for our country, and, to a large extent, the Allies. There have been other nation-wide achievements by the Southern Commercial Congress of less magnitude, but also of great importance.

The International Trade Commission assembled at New York on August 18 last and sailed on the following day on the steamer Homeric. Every part of the country, from the Pacific coast to New England and from Ohio to Alabama, was represented. The members held appointments from the Governors of Tennessee, Missouri, Ohio, Maryland, Virginia, Pennsylvania, Alabama, Washington, North Carolina, New Hampshire, Georgia, and from the Southern Commercial Congress.

The commission included growers, manufacturers, exporters, bankers, executives of commercial organizations, and other fields of industry. There were several ladies, who were commissioned by the governors of various States because of their activity in women's clubs and public affairs. The commission was about evenly divided between the two great political parties, and its investigation and findings have been absolutely without consideration of national or international politics.

The commission studied the European problems and ventures to suggest remedies, with an eye single to bringing order out of existing chaos, that the enormous debts due to America from Europe may be paid and increased markets may be developed for the extension of American business through the economic betterment of the world, sane reconstruction of the stricken nations, and stabilization of their currency and finances.

The commission landed at Cherbourg and studied in Paris, France; Brussels, Belgium; The Hague, Amsterdam, Rotterdam, Holland; Berlin, Germany; Lucerne, Zurich, Switzerland; Milan, Venice, Rome, Italy; returning to Paris and thence to London.

Investigation was attempted to be made in the following fields:
Europe's needs as to raw material and manufactured products.
Europe's ability to pay and Europe's need of American credit.
Export information.
Import information.
The sources of information consulted were:
Diplomatic and consular officers of the United States.
Trade commissioners of the United States Department of Commerce.
Ministries of commerce of European countries.
International chambers of commerce in European countries.
American Express Co., European offices.
Independent agencies of information, including (a) individuals, (b) organizations.

Courtesies were invoked for the commission by the State Department and the Department of Commerce of the United States and every facility was granted for the successful prosecution of the work by the agencies of the United States in the countries visited and by the governmental and business organizations and interested individuals in these countries.

Conferences were held in every city visited and the officials and agencies heretofore enumerated called to testify before juries of inquiry. The commission met with no refusal nor hesitation to testify, but in every country with a full and frank statement of facts and conditions from the viewpoint of the witness.

A number of valuable reports and documents prepared by the United States Diplomatic and Commercial Service and by officials and economists of the various European countries was received by the commission and incorporated in its records.

In seeking to learn existing trade and financial conditions and any barriers to extension of American trade that may exist, in every country except Italy the answer both of foreign officials and financiers and of American diplomatic and commercial representatives and of Americans in business, there resident, invariably led back to the German reparations and the allied debts to the United States.

Before leaving France, the first country visited, it became evident that these problems were fundamental and must be settled before the question of trade extension can be intelligently considered.

Another startling fact impressed itself, the psychological aspect of the situation. It is difficult for Americans to understand that notwithstanding the Versailles treaty, Europe is more nearly on the verge of war than at any period immediately preceding the World War. In France the dominant feeling, permeating everything and every man, woman, and child, in the air, in conversation, in business, even in the press, is fear—fear of another attack by Germany, a Germany whose soil war did not touch, a Germany with every factory in frenzied operation, the great Krupp works running full shifts, and scientists in their elaborate laboratories designing or already preparing new devilish gas or chemical, which dropped from above will doom to instant death an army or a city full or a countryside. And Germany, a far greater and more powerful nation than France, emphasized by memories of the debacle of 1870. That is the unquestioned situation in France to-day notwithstanding the treaty provision limiting Germany to an army of 100,000 men and equipment and munitions for no more, while France has 800,000 men under arms. It is not good for the morale of the nation or the world; it is not conducive to peace nor to a reasonable consideration of the great problems that must be faced and solved to-day and upon a just solution of which the welfare—to say the least—of the world, including the United States, depends.

Not only that she needs the money, because she already has spent it, lavishly, extravagantly, relying upon payment in the immediate future of money that by no physical possibility can be paid for years and never in the sum fixed by the Reparation Commission, but also and more emphatically because of this fear which demands that Germany shall be crippled and dismembered and prevented from re-establishing herself, France declares that Germany must pay and shall pay the entire 132 billion gold marks and shall make the payment specified when the present temporary moratorium, resultant from the Belgian compromise, expires. France even suggests that it is the duty of the United States to aid in forcing Germany to make this payment, for if this payment fails, then France will fall, and with France, civilization. But before the crash comes, a million French soldiers will march into the Ruhr district. There are wise heads in France who realize the futility of this threat and the impossibility of Germany meeting the requirements.

One representative of the French Government has even whispered that the hope of France in insisting upon the letter of the treaty is not to force payment in full but to compel a dissolution of the former great German Empire into its constituent, free-from-military federation. This is a secret of the innermost circle, but the statement has been made on very high authority.

There are some who are optimistic enough to believe that there is a forlorn hope that, without German reparations, the indomitable spirit and wonderful thrift of France may pull her through; but we have not exaggerated the attitude of France, as impressed upon the commission by officials, financiers, representatives of commerce and industry, and quite "out Frenching" the French, to paraphrase one of the clever epigrams of Poincaré, by American diplomats and officers and directors of the American and International Chambers of Commerce. And, of course, America must give up all thought of expecting any payment of the allied debts. This latter is not expressed by official France but is the overwhelming sentiment. No provision for such payment is given consideration in preparing the budget.

The attitude of Belgium—Government, industry, finance, people—is a simple ditto. If Germany fails to pay the last mark named in the reparations demand, and at the appointed time, then France and Belgium fall, and civilization goes back to the Dark Ages—and civilization includes the United States.

Holland says these demands can not be met; Germany must be given a chance to get back on her feet; for Germany is Holland's hinterland, and if Germany falls—and fall she must, and soon unless given a breathing spell—then Holland falls, too, and with them all Europe.

The commission was assured by the United States ambassador at Berlin that it was idle to ask for the attitude of Germany, for there were as many different attitudes as there are German people—about 60,000,000. Still, the attitude of Germany is sufficiently clear. Germany, with its gold and securities of value safe in neutral lands, with worthless paper currency and apparent financial collapse, but with a frenzied agricultural and industrial activity in production, declares that the treaty of Versailles must be revised so that Germany may be free to compete in the world's markets—that Germany can not pay anything like the preposterous sum demanded, nor at all until she is free to import raw material and to export manufactured goods. Germany can live and gradually rebuild her shattered economic structure and pay a reasonable reparation in due time, but only if she be allowed to export. Germany must keep her factories running and her workers employed or the Russian revolution looms near. She has a short crop and raises only food enough to feed her people for seven months. She must import food for five months. She has left 1,000,000,000 gold marks. If she pays this into Belgium, as demanded, she can no longer buy raw materials abroad, for her paper currency is of no value except within her borders. Nor can she buy food next spring to avert threatening famine when her own production is exhausted. Without raw material, with her hundreds of thousands out of work and starving, no power can prevent a bloody revolution and Bolshevism. The Versailles treaty makes it impossible for Germany to build up foreign trade, upon which payment of reparations depends. The treaty must therefore be revised. You can not take away a man's tools and the material upon which he works and expect him to go on with production, from the sale of which he must pay his bills. He can not.

If France marches an army into the Ruhr district, Germany will fight; there is no other alternative; it is for life. If the Allies prevent Germany from doing business with the West, she will look to the East. There is a great storehouse of raw material and food; there is an army in the making that can overwhelm Europe under veteran German commanders; Russian industry in trained German hands. This is whispered; aloud it is emphatically declared: "Germany will look to the East."

Hugo Stinnes, the head of German finance and industry, closed a contract while the commission was in Germany to expend 13,000,000,000 francs in reconstruction in the devastated area in France, to apply on reparations. This proposition was gladly approved by France. It was only a day or two before it was whispered in Berlin that the hidden political purpose of this move overshadowed its surface intent. It is no secret that Stinnes has his agents all over Russia. It is true that they have failed in some of their efforts, and this has been played up in the newspaper press; but it is also true that Germans, directed by Stinnes, are gradually getting into control or at least into direct contact with Russian industry and commerce. Had Stinnes proposed to go into Russia on so tremendous a scale as he has in the devastated regions in France, France would have shouted an emphatic "No." But France has very cordially approved the Stinnes contract; how can she even criticize a contract in Russia, a Russia that owes France a billion dollars of borrowed money and other billions on investments now worthless? And what does a German-Russian military alliance mean to the peace of Europe—and that unquestionably includes the peace of the world.

This summary of the attitude of Germany is accurate, so far as the judgment of the commission may go. What keeps Germany stirred up and resentful is the occupation by French colored troops, who, it is emphatically declared, were at the outset, but are not at the present time, guilty of outrages. This attitude is not good for the morale of Germany nor of the world; it is not conducive to peace nor to a reasonable consideration of the great world problems that must be solved without further futile dalliance.

Switzerland, or a considerable part of it, sympathizes with Germany. The hotel or tourist industry is actually the principal industry of Switzerland. Germany furnished a good percentage of the Swiss tourists, and now practically none, because the Germans who were formerly wealthy are now bankrupt. Germans can not pay foreign hotel bills in paper marks. The hotels were in such bad condition financially that they were about to close. To prevent this the Government stepped in and saved its leading industry by dipping into the treasury and handing out a sufficient bonus to make up the deficit. And so Switzerland very generally and very naturally wants Germany to be given a breathing spell and a chance for new life.

There is, of course, no question of the ability of the British Empire to pay its debts. The four billions the United States loaned England is an absolutely sound investment so long as the American Government keeps its head. England can pay and will pay. The payment of $50,000,000 of interest this month guarantees this. The British Government maintains an absolutely impeccable position. "Hands across the sea" really guarantees the peace of the world. And still the British press and the British public rather more than hints that the United States made billions out of the war and now has most of the gold of the world; that America was quite as vitally interested in quelling the world-dominion ambition of Germany as Britain or France; and that the billions loaned to Europe were for America's defense and should be wiped off the slate, or very materially reduced. A very high authority said to the officers of the commission in London—an authority so high that it can not be quoted: "This payment of $50,000,000 interest is merely a gesture. England says that, of course, she can pay and will pay to the uttermost farthing. But poor France, poor Belgium, poor Italy, they can not pay a dollar and never will be able to. America must remember that France and Belgium and Great Britain fought her fight for her and saved her from the Hun. England will pay, but France and Belgium and Italy, they can not pay one dollar. America must cancel these debts and charge it to national protection. And then what? England knows that if the United States cancels the debts of France and Belgium and Italy it must accord to Britain exactly the same treatment. If you know your Bible, you will remember Uriah. Britain has had centuries of training in the intricacies of diplomacy. With full consideration of and sympathy with "Hands across the sea," it is the judgment of the commission that the basic principle of England is "England first and always," and that there is some foundation for the statement of the very high authority above quoted.

Whether the cause for its attitude upon German reparations, diametrically opposed to that of France, be selfish or merely wise, Great Britain's position that Germany can not pay the sum demanded and must be given a chance to recuperate is sound. The declaration made in France that Britain is merely pursuing her time-honored policy of dividing the continent so as to prevent the development of too strong a rival, and is encouraging Germany to make no attempt to pay, in order to cripple France, is hysteria merely.

London has been the center of world finance for generations and economic principles are understood. Despite rivalry and suspicion, prior to the World War Germany and Britain were each the largest customer of the other. The severe depression in British agriculture is ascribed by every authority consulted to a glut resultant from the shutting off of the German market. England realizes that a return to normalcy in Europe is dependent upon the restoration of sound economical and financial conditions in Germany. Here, as elsewhere, these problems are fundamental.

Italy was the only country where we found a different viewpoint. Italy has cleaned house. The assumption of political power by the Fascists since the commission left Italy does not at all affect the situation. The Fascists rather overdo it, but the Fascists stand for loyalty to Italy, loyalty to the King—who is democratic and clear thinking—and for law and order.

Italy has handled the threat of communism and socialism boldly and forcefully through the Fascists and has demonstrated to the local I. W. W.'s, to paraphrase the deathless words of Garfield, "God reigns and the government at Rome still lives." Italy has molded her financial policy upon close economy and progressively high and yet higher taxation. In Italy alone of all the European countries visited, the fundamental problems of German reparations and of the allied debts were not referred to in any conference with Government officials and financial and commercial representatives.

These are the problems upon which the peace and welfare of the world depend—the German reparations, the allied debts. The International Trade Commission has not attempted to evade these fundamental questions. It has endeavored to study them from the standpoint of every country visited, and with a clean mental slate to grasp the situation, and has even assumed to suggest the remedy. It is very clear that the extension of American trade with Europe—the object of the commission—hinges, as does every world question, upon a right solution.

Just before leaving London for the home voyage, the officers of the commission, in conference with perhaps the leading representative of American financial interests in Europe, said, "It is, of course, presumptuous for a score of everyday Americans to come over here for a few weeks and take upon themselves the troubles of the world." The answer was this: "Not at all. That is the wrong viewpoint. These people have been muddling along for four years. Nobody has suggested a way out, and nobody has thought of it. They are simply preparing for the next war. A solution must come, and it must come now. A constructive plan is needed; you have offered it. Your recommendation is sane, feasible, and practicable and should be promptly acted upon by the Congress."

Restoration of normal trade conditions and increased market for America undoubtedly depend upon a sane settlement of German reparations and the allied debts. Germany must pay a reasonable sum for reparations—as great a sum as is within her economic possibility. To demand a sum that could not conceivably be paid by any nation, more money than there is in the world, and at the same time to impose conditions that prevent Germany from paying, does not evade the question; it makes an answer impossible. The sum demanded from Germany—a sum incomprehensible before the World War changed our computations from thousands to billions—must be reduced to a figure that Germany can conceivably pay in time. No figure of billions upon billions could possibly make reparation for the moral as well as physical loss to the world caused by the World War, which must be laid at the door of Germany. If Germany could be forced to and could work out and pay unlimited billions, there would be no serious problem. If the United States could build a wall around its boundaries and live unto itself, ignoring the rest of the world, these problems would have only a passing interest for us. Germany can not pay the sum demanded; the United States can not live unto itself without an economic readjustment that is utterly unnecessary and that would entail years of financial loss and unemployment.

A few weeks ago President Harding said: "The first duty is to protect our national interests, but in many ways real protection comes from cooperation with other nations. The best intelligence of the day recognizes the need to encourage intimacy and understanding in the social, economic, and political family of nations, and it recognizes that thus inaugurating a plan which looks to intimate consideration of the facts we are offering a means of true unification and solidarity among the interests which make up our industrial civilization and we are taking a step toward the solution of some of the most perplexing economic problems which confront the nations.

"The last thing in our thoughts is aloofness from the rest of the world. We wish to be helpful, neighborly, useful. To protect ourselves first and then to use the strength accruing through that policy for the welfare of mankind is our sincere purpose."

Following this declaration of the attitude of the American Government toward world problems the International Trade Commission has ventured to "inaugurate a plan which looks to intimate consideration of the facts" upon which the peace and welfare of the world depend and "offers a means of true unification and solidarity among the interests which make up civilization and is a step toward the solution of the most perplexing problems which confront the nations. We wish America to be helpful, neighborly, useful. To protect ourselves first and then to use the strength accruing through that policy for the general welfare of mankind."

In an address at Boston, October 30, Secretary Hughes declared the foreign policy of the administration to be a policy of helpfulness and good understanding, without entanglements which would fetter American independence. He characterized the arms conference as meaning the rescue of the world from despair. He closed by saying: "There is no reason why we should fritter away our helpful influence by becoming a partisan of another party to a conference, much less make the fatal mistake of attempting to assume the rôle of a dictator."

This is sound principle. Just as the United States rescued the world from despair by calling the Washington conference, so it can save the peace of Europe and of the world and bring sane reconstruction out of chaos by inviting the allied nations and Germany to another like conference of Government officials and leading financiers and economists, which shall solve the problems of German reparations and allied debts, shall pave the way for reduction of armaments, insure payments of reparations and of the debts, give America increased markets in Europe, stabilize exchange to some degree, and reduce the burden of taxation that now hangs heavy over the American people.

On October 16, in an address at Toledo, Secretary Hoover said: "Our loans to the Allies, now amounting to $11,500,000,000, are in fact debts to our taxpayers. I do not believe any public official, either of the United States or any other country, could or should approve their cancellation. With the exception of minor amounts, I am convinced that these debts can be repaid in a reasonable period without realization of the oft-expressed undue strain on the debtor countries or the threat of a flood of goods that would endanger employment in the United States."

"The shipment of European manufactured goods that might compete in our home market to the Tropics, and in turn the shipment to us of tropical goods that will not interfere with our domestic manufacture or employment, not only is possible but is going on all the time. These tropical products are a type of goods which we can not produce sufficiently—rubber, coffee, woods, etc. They do not affect employment in the United States, and they are constantly increasing in ratio to our total imports. In the last seven years our imports from the Tropics have increased from 35 to 53 per cent of our total imports. The expenditures of American tourists abroad, remittances of immigrants in the United States to relatives, the growing volume of investments made by our citizens in foreign countries, and other items of so-called invisible exchange give Europe a large supply of American money with which Europe may in turn pay interest on debts or for the purchase of goods from us."

"There is no need for despair in the future of Europe if Europe can maintain peace. Its hard-working population, its tremendous intelligence, its fabulous development of skill and scientific knowledge are vital forces that must win if they have half a chance. These economic problems we must vision over years and decades. Europe's troubles to-day are solely in the fiscal and political fields. Her social organization, her agriculture, industry, transportation, and commerce have found extraordinary recuperative powers from the depths of disorganization and famine in 1919."

The commission is glad to find these views of the leading economist in the Government of the United States coincident with its own findings. It believes its recommendation of a solution of the problems to be entirely in harmony with the declarations of the President and of the Secretaries of State and of Commerce above quoted. The United States can not hold aloof, as the President has said. It must take the initiative in aiding in a settlement. The allied debts to the United States must be paid. No nation should ask for its debts to be forgiven, but only for time and for patient consideration. These debts were the security offered to the American people and to the people of the world—for our Liberty and Victory bonds were sold all over the world—and no American Government will ever repudiate or annul the security for its obligations. Ambassador Harvey said to the commission in London: "There is no vicious circle; there is no circle. It is a straight line, leading directly from Germany to the people of the United States. The United States will not take upon itself the cost of the war. The Congress can not annul these debts. They are debts to the American people and to foreign people who bought the bonds, not to the Government." While hate and anger are still in the hearts of many, the settlement between the nations formerly belligerent must be on a basis of even justice and of international respect and consideration.

Congressman—former Senator—THEODORE E. BURTON is an economist, a financier, and a statesman who has made a close study of European conditions for many years. He has recently returned from a two months' investigation, as a member of the United States Foreign Debt Funding Commission, and his judgment is likely to carry weight with the Congress and with the people of the United States. In an address at Cleveland on October 17 Congressman BURTON said:

"Most of the difficulty in Europe, I must say frankly, is due to the treaties. It was impossible in view of the attitude of Paris to consider the subject dispassionately. The crime of the Hohenzollern dynasty was unspeakable, but it is not desirable to reduce the German people to the condition of serfs and impose upon them a burden so staggering that they are unable to carry it. It is not merely not best for them; it is not best for the rest of the world."

"In France there are three phases of public opinion. One would impose reprisals on Germany so heavy as to destroy her economic life, her position as a nation, and that Germany be practically ruined. The second is based on the opinion that Germany is merely pretending that she can not pay the enormous bill rendered against her. The third phase, and the one I think is growing, is that the taking away of Germany from the economic life of Europe would be similar in effect to depriving Ohio of intercourse with Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, and Wisconsin; her prosperity is essential not only for the upbuilding of her own people but for the rest of the world.

"The reparation is fixed at 132,000,000,000 gold marks, about $30,000,000,000, to be paid in three installments of twelve, thirty-eight, and eighty-two billions. That burden upon a country with $70,000,000,000 of wealth is clearly altogether beyond her ability to pay. The attempt to collect these reparations is an injury to the economic, social, and political life of the world.

"The task of fixing the boundaries was certainly not well performed. Natural boundaries were disregarded, alien peoples were mingled. The treaties were framed in haste, with regard for political consideration, with entire disregard of race, old-time associations, or economic considerations.

"The probability is that the vast paper currency of Germany will be repudiated. No permanent prosperity can be attained while there is such a currency. The paralysis which rests on Europe is not limited to the countries which were engaged in war. It rests with similar weight upon Holland, Sweden, Norway, Denmark, Switzerland; for the whole life of trade is out of gear.

"What is the remedy? There must be a reconsideration of those treaties. They were framed in terms of severity and punishment; they must be revised in the interest of more normal relations. They will have to cut out their feeling of animosity. There must be a better feeling, a readiness to enter into treaties or agreements for trade and other things which will promote friendliness in place of the present asperity.

"We are vitally interested. Now, what ought we to do? We must give our charity without limit in this troubled world. Let us be helpful so far as we may, by diplomatic negotiations or otherwise, in the troubled state of Europe. Let, however, our chiefest aim be along the lines which have been our glory in the past, the absence of selfish motives, no hankering for territory, none for great indemnities; let America stand before all nations for peace, good will, for that spirit of altruism and regard for humanity, the lack of which is responsible for the unrest and for the threat of war which is now so prevalent in the world."

It is evident that the reaction of existing European conditions upon the trained mind of Congressman BURTON is identical with that upon the minds of the International Trade Commission. The necessity of America's participation in the settlement that must be found without delay is obvious.

Two words contain the solution of the world problems in this hour of unhappy and chaotic uncertainty. They are moratorium and amortization. England could pay its debts, Belgium might make a small payment. France and Italy can not pay at this time; Germany can not pay until she is given a breathing spell. She must pay to her utmost ability, of course, but the Versailles treaty must be revised to give Germany the opportunity to manufacture and export, and from the sale of exports meet the reparations. If there was adequate reason for a six months' moratorium, as provided by the Belgian compromise, there will be greater reason for a longer extension at the end of that period. A moratorium of a longer and definite period must be accepted, three to five years. It would be idle for America to attempt to force payment of its debts now, where no country but England can balance its budget. If the Allies attempt to force the defeated nations beyond physical ability to pay, the result would be disastrous and armed conflict could hardly be averted. With a reasonable breathing spell, and upon the basis we are about to suggest, all can pay their obligations with dignity and honor. Hence the necessity of a moratorium of several years.

The simple way for payment of these great sums is by amortization. This word is used, not as frequently in this country, but in the specific meaning it is used as the basis of the Federal farm loan act, under which in the last six years the American farmer has learned that the payment of 1 per cent added to the rate of interest pays off his mortgage in 69 equal semiannual payments.

Close study of European finance indicates the need of a long amortization period and a low rate of interest. No country, excepting England, could make annual payments of any considerable percentage of the debt. Some American financiers urge that Europe be freed from interest charges, arguing that the more the United States will lighten and take over the burden the better it will be for us in the end. This view is not likely to meet the approval of the American people. There is this to be considered: There is some foundation for the claim that this is not an ordinary debt, but that America was vitally interested in the defense against Germany. The moral effect of giving some consideration to this universal attitude of Europe carries weight. It is further to be considered that we can not exact the impossible any more than the Allies can from Germany and that if we insist on the immediate letter of the contract, we shall get very little or nothing. And the sooner Europe is placed on a sane financial and economic basis the sooner we can extend our foreign trade.

The commission suggests that the United States generously, and doubtless wisely, agree to reduce the rate of interest to 3 per cent, which, with one-half of 1 per cent amortization, will pay off the entire loan in 66 years. The figures of the allied debts are, in round numbers, Great Britain $4,000,000,000, France $3,000,000,000, Italy $1,700,000,000, and Belgium $850,000,000. On the amortization plan suggested, Great Britain will pay annually $140,000,000, France $105,000,000, Italy $59,500,000, and Belgium $12,250,000. The unpaid interest to date is not considered in this suggestion. That would be provided for in the contract of settlement. Great Britain could assume this obligation to-day, no other of the debtor nations. That they will be able to after a three to five year moratorium is demonstrated in the chapters discussing the financial and economic condition of the several countries, hereinafter set forth.

The German reparation is, of course, the basic question of world peace and economic readjustment. The commission enters upon this discussion without hesitancy. There is demanded from Germany by the Reparation Commission 132,000,000,000 gold marks and a very considerable amount of coal, other payments in kind, and a 26 per cent charge upon the value of exports, something over $800,000,000 annually. One of the leading economists who was present at the Versailles conference said to the officers of this commission, "Nobody above the status of an economic adviser gave the slightest thought to economic considerations. All decisions were based upon politics and religion." In England it is realized clearly that Germany can not pay anything like the sum demanded. In fact, English economists have asserted that even Great Britain could not pay a third of this sum. Germany can pay a reasonable reparation in time, if given a breathing spell and a chance to export. There is no attempt on the part of German officials or financiers to deny or evade this responsibility.

What should be the sum required? The figures of the American economists who made a careful study of Germany's wealth at the Versailles conference, were $12,000,000,000. These figures were not considered for a minute by "anybody above the status of an economic adviser." J. M. Keynes, representative of the British Treasury at the conference, declared that the limit of Germany's ability was 2,000,000,000 marks a year, or approximately $500,000,000, and that the total sum to be expected was 40,000,000,000 marks or $10,000,000,000. These estimates were based on conditions at the time of the armistice and not upon present conditions. Doctor Bucher, managing director of the Federation of German Industries, expressed the prevailing willingness to pay reparation and estimated the present ability of Germany to pay, if the treaty is revised and she is allowed to export, at 1,000,000,000 gold marks, or $250,000,000 a year. It is not difficult to get at Germany's ability to pay—which must be the basis of the reparations—if a conference be held and the cards are laid on the table. Just this must be done.

The International Trade Commission suggests as a basis for discussion the figures $12,000,000,000. This is based not only upon study of existing German conditions and the tremendously increased income which will, or would, result from a revision of the Versailles treaty, but also upon the judgment of the American economists in 1919 and upon that of Mr. Keynes, who was recalled by the British Government because he ventured to speak out. On the basis of $12,000,000,000 Germany would pay annually $420,000,000, which would clean up the entire payment in 66 years. This total is that of the American economists. It is $80,000,000 a year less than Mr. Keynes's estimate, while the total sum paid in 66 years is $2,000,000,000 more than Mr. Keynes estimated. It is also about 50 per cent more than Doctor Bucher declared they could pay.

How much of this amount is to be paid in gold and how much in kind is contingent upon the estimated effect upon the economy of the world of German exports when the present frenzied production is directed into foreign channels. This whole problem might have been settled and economic stability restored had the suggestion of American economists at Versailles been considered—a reasonable reparation figure, to be paid very largely in manufactures of brick, tile, structural iron, and other building material for reconstruction in the devastated regions of France and Belgium. Since not economic but political considerations were the motif at Versailles, it is now necessary to make the best of a bad situation.

That the working out of this amortization plan may be clearly understood, the commission herewith presents a table showing the amortization of $1,000,000,000 in 66 years at 3 per cent interest and one-half of 1 per cent amortization, which may be used as a basis for figuring the reparations. There are also offered tables showing the amortization of the reparations on the basis suggested, $12,000,000,000, and of the allied debts at the same rate of interest and amortization. The amount for Germany and the rate of interest and time of payment for Germany and the Allies must be within their ability to pay. These tables have been worked out carefully. They have been checked by accountants under the direction of Mr. Guy Huston, president of the first joint-stock land bank, who figured the amortization tables of the Federal farm loan system. They were transmitted through Hon. Jacob M. Dickinson, chairman of the Chicago Committee of One Hundred, to President Harry Pratt Judson, of the University of Chicago, and pronounced mathematically correct by the mathematical department of that institution, as indicated by the accompanying letter:

THE UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO,
OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT,
Chicago, Ill., November 9, 1922.

MY DEAR DOCTOR OWENS: I am inclosing the official report to me on the proposed financial payments by the head of our department of mathematics, Prof. Eliakim H. Moore. Professor Moore is one of the eminent mathematicians of the country.

Very truly yours,

HARRY PRATT JUDSON.

THE UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO,
DEPARTMENT OF MATHEMATICS,
November 8, 1922.

To the PRESIDENT.

MY DEAR DOCTOR JUDSON: In response to the question recently submitted to me on behalf of President Clarence J. Owens, of the Southern Commercial Congress, I report as follows:

The sum of $1,000,000,000, with interest at 3 per cent per annum, will be amortized by 65 annual payments of $35,000,000 each and a final payment at the end of the sixty-sixth year of $29,186,297.2295.

The residue at the end of 65 years, $28,336,210.9024, with interest for the sixty-sixth year, $850,086.3271, make the final payment stated. These figures, which have been with care determined in cooperation with my colleague, Mr. W. D. MacMillan, an expert in the use of the calculating machine, may be relied upon as quite correct. They exceed the corresponding figures found in the table submitted by President Owens by—

$0.0132

$0.0127

$0.0005

These are the essential figures of that table.

Yours very truly,

ELIAKIM H. MOORE.

The tables are as follows:

The first table was carried out to four decimals, so that the error in the final figure would be infinitesimal. It is figured by the mathematical experts of the University of Chicago at five one-hundredths of a cent. The variation in the other tables also is fractions of a cent.

It is the judgment of the commission, after consultation with American representatives and with officials and financiers of European countries, that the initiative for a conference, from which an agreement as outlined above may result, must come from the United States. President Harding's initiative in calling the Washington conference "rescued the world from despair," in Secretary Hughes's words. This is undoubtedly true. Even more than that great accomplishment will result from another conference to be called by the President which may settle the problems of the world.

If a settlement of the German reparations and of payment of the allied debt be effected as we have ventured to suggest, the next step is an international loan, to be financed by the United States and Great Britain, to the Allies where needed and to Germany. It is unnecessary to discuss this; it must be done. The European nations can not get on their feet nor pay their debts without working capital. With it, and relieved of military expenditures, they can do it. This loan should not be made by the Governments, but by private financial interests, probably under Government direction and control to make exploitation impossible. The commission is advised by New York financiers to whom its proposal was outlined upon landing in New York, October 13, that they are ready to handle this loan if there is a sane settlement of German reparations and of the allied debts. In connection with this loan and as a contract obligation of the settlement to be agreed upon by the proposed conference, there must be a material reduction of armaments and of military expenses and guaranties against war. French expenditures for the national defense amount, for example, to 5,105,000,000 francs, or 18.7 per cent of the total appropriations for 1920; 5,821,000,000 for 1921, or 22 per cent; and 4,224,000,000, or 17.1 per cent, for 1922. With a guaranty of safety from attack, these expenditures can be reduced so as to balance the budget and at the end of the proposed moratorium to enable France to pay her amortization allotment. The same is true of the other countries.

The remaining problem is stabilization of exchange. There can be no international attempt to stabilize the paper currency of Germany and Russia until conditions return to normalcy in these countries. It may be done in the other countries considered, aside from Britain, which is already practically normal. The fluctuation of exchange, not the present rate, is the problem. If exchange were to remain at the present figure, if this could be guaranteed, America could do business with Europe on the basis of foreign exchange. But with the pre-war franc at 193 cents and the franc when we were in France at something over 7, with the possibility of it being 5 or 12 in three months, it is obvious that Americans can not export to France upon the franc basis, and it is equally obvious that French merchants can not import from the United States upon the dollar basis. In either case profits might be wiped out.

It has been suggested that a supercurrency be established, to be guaranteed at par by a union of nations for foreign trade and to be accepted as a medium of exchange by those nations. So if a French merchant ordered American goods, he would buy in supercurrency and pay in it. The franc would remain the currency in France, the dollar in the United States, the pound sterling in Britain, the lira in Italy. This would enable Europe to get the goods she wants from us and that we want to sell her.

The suggestion of stabilization of exchange by a supercurrency or by a guaranty of an economic union of nations was presented to Lloyds at London by the International commission. Lloyds said that the suggestion was by no means unreasonable; that they were already insuring individual international transactions. This is offered without great confidence, but as possibly entitled to some consideration after the fundamental problems have been solved.

While everywhere in Europe the American representatives of the State and Commerce Departments and of commercial organizations received the commission with all courtesy and tendered all assistance, one could not fail to be impressed by the entire lack of harmony and agreement among them as to viewpoint on European problems. In France, American representatives voiced the French view very emphatically; in Germany, the German. This may be diplomatic policy and practice; but if America is to maintain its traditional policy of "shirt-sleeve diplomacy" European problems should be viewed as a whole from the American standpoint, not from the exaggerated view of unfriendly nations. It is suggested that a periodic conference of American representatives in all European countries and a free discussion might be of benefit.

There is need of a policy to coordinate present agencies and do away with apparent interlarding. For instance, Consul General Skinner, at London, has a staff of 60. There are independent agencies covering more or less the same ground in the office of the trade commissioner, who is under the Department of Commerce, and other officials covering economic and commercial fields attached to the embassy but holding appointment and reporting to either the State or Commerce Department. The Department of Agriculture, the Department of the Treasury, and the Shipping Board also have representatives. Reports from these various representatives go to the department from which each holds authority. Some coordination would seem practicable.

It was stated by representatives of the Consular Service that any suggestions that might seem to criticize existing laws or policies are prohibited. We venture to ask whether American officials abroad are not in a position at times to offer constructive criticism from which beneficial results may be obtained and whether it is not advisable that such be invited.

We have heretofore quoted the ringing words of President Harding. "The first duty is to protect our national interests, but in many ways real protection comes from cooperation with other nations." With the world at sea politically and economically, this is the appointed time for concert of action of all nations, including the United States, that threatened appeal to arms in Europe may be averted and that political and economic peace may be assured. Without discussing the League of Nations, which trenches upon the field of politics, from which the International Trade Commission has kept its skirts clear, there exists in Rome, through the instrumentality of that lamented son of California, David Lubin, with the active cooperation of King Victor Emmanuel, a genuine economic league of nations which alone of all international agencies functioned throughout the World War, and which has been and is of incalculable value to its constituent nations. Some such union of nations as the International Institute of Agriculture, free from supergovernment and leaving each nation to govern itself under its own fundamental law, might be of like value in the field of international economy, finance, and interrelation. In this state of civilization the interdependence of nations and the moral unity of the world, through the inseparable ties of blood, of history, of literature, science, and art, of law, of religion, must be recognized.

America is not a new civilization; under the Constitution of the United States it maintains the oldest Government among the nations of the world. Because this Government of and by a free people has, through its principles of liberty and justice and right survived the overthrow and the changes that have come in all forms of government, because of the moral leadership conceded by all peoples, in this hour of world chaos, of threatened irreparable disaster, this is the appointed time, this is the moment for action that will become historic. When the World War deluged Europe with blood America waited, perhaps too long, but America responded to the call of liberty and right with every drop of blood and with every resource. When that danger was averted and the post-war conditions have gradually become worse and more threatening America has again waited; but as in 1917, America must respond, and when America again acts with wisdom and "uses its strength," as the President has said, "for the general welfare of mankind," every American and every clear-thinking European must have full faith in a second victory.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE COMMISSION.
CLARENCE J. OWENS, Chairman.
RALPH METCALF, Secretary.

CHICAGO, ILL., November 20, 1923.

CONDITIONS IN THE VARIOUS COUNTRIES VISITED BY THE COMMISSION. GERMANY.

When the commission told Ambassador Houghton at the first conference with him at the embassy in Berlin that it had learned the viewpoint of France, Belgium, and Holland, and would like to get that of Germany, the ambassador replied: "There is no German viewpoint, or rather there are as many different opinions as there are Germans, and that is about 60,000,000. Can you hope to get it in a week?" It will be well to bear this in mind. The fact remains that the commission conferred with some of the leading men in Germany in the field of finance, industry, and commerce, and they outlined the attitude of Germany quite as clearly and frankly as previously had been that of France.

Two of the most informative sessions were with Herr Alfred Blinzig, director of the great Deutsche Bank, and with Doctor Bucher, managing director of the Federation of German Industries. Mr. Blinzig is a man well along in years, of great ability and logical mind. He said:

"It is difficult to see how credit and confidence can be restored so as to allow a renewal and increase of trade relations between the United States and Germany until the Versailles treaty is revised. No country can pay out billions a year without exports; even the United States could not do this. First the reparation problem must be definitely settled.

"You criticize us for printing unlimited paper money that has no purchasing value in other countries. We have had to do it; our capital is not sufficient to keep our industries in operation. It takes 300 of our paper marks to equal the foreign value of 1 gold mark. Please understand that in Germany the paper mark has a purchasing value of 100 to 1 gold mark. Because of the lack of capital and of a circulating medium, we have been forced to greatly increase our paper circulation. And still we have not near enough. Germany is in the throes of a credit crisis. The banks can not furnish enough currency to enable their clients to do business." (At this time, September 10, the banks were paying but 20 per cent of the face value of checks presented for payment.)

"Germany can not get credit in foreign countries because of the uncertainty. We have to pay cash. Confidence must be restored before international trade relations can be revived with your country or any country. It all comes back to the reparation problem, which must first be settled. We can pay and will pay only what we are able to pay. Germany is an industrial, not an agricultural country. We have very little raw material. Before the war the balance was on the wrong side, but this was met by our foreign investments and our merchant marine. Now, this is all gone, so that we can not pay for the raw material we must have to operate our industries. Why, it may surprise you, but I can not get enough money upon my checks here at my own bank to meet my daily needs.

"Our people are naturally industrious and willing to work, but there is no hope for Germany until the reparation problem is settled. Then we can secure the necessary capital from a foreign loan. It is impossible for the present generation to pay the war burden; it must be distributed over three generations. Germany must have a breathing space for a few years, and then take up the payment of reparation when the amount is adjusted. To meet this, to live, we must export our industrial products. We must use the largest part of the returns from our exports for raw material, to buy raw material to continue manufacturing. The surplus will be applied to the reparation fund, but it is impossible ever to pay anything like the sum demanded.

"Germany has no hope for the future without a foreign loan. Our inflated currency must be taken care of, and to stabilize the mark our budget must be balanced. It can not be balanced with the reparation now demanded. With a reasonable adjustment and a foreign loan we can restore normal conditions. A very serious difficulty is speculation in the market by foreigners. We must have sufficient funds to protect and ultimately restore it. When foreign speculators attempt to drive the value down by selling, we must have a fund to protect it by buying. When speculators attempt to buy, we must be able to protect it.

Asked by Chairman Owens if the situation could be stabilized by the amortization plan proposed by the commission, whereby Germany could pay her reparations and the Allies their debts to the United States, over a long term of years, at a low rate of interest, Director Blinzig said:

"It would not be well for the United States if this vast amount of gold should be paid her, but if the interest was reduced to, say, 1½ per cent with one-half per cent amortization, the plan seems sound, if the reparation be based on a reasonable figure. We are no longer actors on the world's stage; we are acted upon. As soon as Germany is permitted to sit at the conference table with the other nations everything can be arranged."

To a statement from the commission that it is the general belief that if debts were materially reduced Germany would start another war against France, Director Blinzig said very earnestly:

"We are perfectly willing to give any guaranty against this. The best guaranty would be the agreement of the United States and Great Britain to protect France in such case. I would not at all object to this; I would welcome it. Clemenceau asked for this, Great Britain agreed, contingent upon the assent of the United States, which was refused. If this alliance could be made, it should be much better for the world. It would remove the present fear of France and stabilize the situation. The army of occupation is costing millions, which Germany could better pay in reparation. Germany is ready to give any possible guaranty against any aggressive war. The best possible guaranty is an American-French alliance. I appreciate political conditions in the United States and know that this can not be done. Still it is the best guaranty."

"A word as to finances. We have now inflated our currency to 2,000,000,000 paper marks; it would be a thousand billions to furnish us the necessary medium of exchange at home. We have not nearly enough. It is silly to charge that Germany is printing paper money to depreciate the mark. We must have it to keep our industries at work, we must keep on printing paper money to provide a medium of exchange for internal business. We will stabilize the mark when the reparation question is settled. Nine out of ten people in Germany would vote against war, except in the occupied districts, where they are indignant at outrages perpetrated by negro troops of the French Army."

This is the attitude of German finance; that of German industry is equally clear. The commission held a conference with the spokesman for industry, Doctor Bucher, managing director of the Federation of German Industries, which comprises all of the factories and plants in every line of industry—steel, lumber, electric, mines, railroads—its membership running up into many thousand companies and individuals. Doctor Bucher said:

"Present conditions are very different from those existing at the time of the visit of the American commission in 1913. Before the war Germany produced 90 per cent of its food requirements; now it produces only 60 per cent. Our food production is sufficient for seven months, and we must import for five months. This is due to the loss of great agricultural territory, such as Poland, and also because it will take 10 years to restore pre-war intensive cultivation. Our farmers can not afford to buy fertilizer, and the war cost us great quantities of live stock. It must be remembered that the soil of Germany is naturally one of the poorest in Europe, so the loss of fertilizer and live stock is evident. Another difficulty is that formerly we had an abundance of farm labor, temporarily imported from Russia and Poland, that is not now available. Machinery can not replace this labor as in the United States, because German farms are small, 10 to 15 acres. Only in the north, now given to Poland, had we farms of over 200 acres. Consequently our farmers do not produce a sufficient surplus beyond their own needs."

"Before the war German exports were 10,000,000,000 marks and imports 11,000,000,000, an adverse balance of trade of 1,000,000,000. Germany had 20,000,000,000 gold marks in foreign investments, the income from which and the merchant marine met this adverse balance. All of this has been confiscated. Now our exports are about two-thirds of the pre-war figure, while imports have so increased that the present adverse balance of trade is nearly 5,000,000,000. Germany has lost not only the income from foreign investments and her freights but also the money formerly sent home by Germans living abroad. There were so many Germans employed in it that one might say Russian industry was German industry. Because of the war these workers have all come home. Germans naturalized in the United States remained there, but a million not naturalized have been sent to Germany and can not go back."

"Before the war we had a gold reserve of a billion to a billion and a half gold marks. We still have a billion but have sent abroad a billion and a half, because during the war all of the gold in the country was taken by the Reichsbank. The billion and a half sent abroad was partly for payment on foreign purchases in neutral countries and partly the result of the Versailles treaty."

Asked if the charge was true that Germany had sent her gold to foreign countries for safekeeping, he said this was true to a certain extent. The Government had forbidden the export of capital, but it was impossible to prevent individuals sending out their gold. The Versailles treaty provides that capital and goods of German citizens at home and in the allied countries can be confiscated if the Government does not fulfill its obligations. Therefore, Germans have placed it where they feel it is secure. The money is necessary to buy raw material. Raw material for German industry requires 250,000,000 marks a month, which, allowing six months for return, totals a billion and a half. Most of this gold is kept in Holland and Switzerland. Some Germans have sent their gold abroad for security, but most of it is to buy raw material. One electric company requires 2,000 tons of copper a month from America. German manufacturers are compelled to pay a 28 per cent tax on all their exports into the reparation fund. Foreign countries have also imposed prohibitive tariffs against German goods. For instance, an 80 per cent duty on dyes in the United States, where German steel is also shut out, except in razors, cutlery, and small steel products, which are a German specialty, and the tariff does not interfere materially."

"Trade relations," Doctor Bucher continued, "can not be reestablished until there is a revision of the Versailles treaty. Germany must have economic independence. It is absolutely necessary to import raw materials and foodstuffs, and Germany can pay for this only from her surplus production. She can not pay out of her capital and live. One important point is that farmers are prosperous; they have no foreign competition, because we can not import foreign products to any extent."

"It is not possible to stabilize finance until we first have reconstruction. It can not be done in a period of decreasing production. We can not accept foreign credit until we are sure that we can repay principal and interest. We can tell the German workman that he must work and economize for 10 or 15 years because we lost the war, but we can not tell him that he must grind for 50 years, which would be the consequence of the treaty of Versailles."

"It is not trade competition that hampers trade. Before the war there was great competition between England and Germany, and still those countries were each the greatest customer of the other. The Versailles treaty gives to the allied countries the advantage of the most favored nation, which is denied Germany. The other countries can make their own regulations, but Germany can not have a tariff policy, because if she grants a special tariff to any country it must apply to all of the Allies."

Asked as to the amortization plan suggested by the commission, Doctor Bucher said that it was possible from the financial point of view, but out of the question from the economic point of view. "During the war Europe paid to the United States its savings for 50 years. Europe has an overwhelming debt. If France is to pay on her three billion debt 5 per cent interest and 1 per cent amortization, she must pay $180,000,000 yearly. It is utterly impossible for her to make this payment. It must be remembered the French people lost 20,000,000,000 gold francs on Russian securities and other money in Turkey. She also has a deficit in her budget. She can not obtain much from Germany, and the only money Germany can pay must come from an international loan. It is impossible for Germany to pay on an amortization plan by increasing taxes, because Germany already has the highest taxes in the world. Taxes must necessarily accord with the standard of living. If Germany appears rich, as you say, it is not true. The Government has dispossessed all people owning capital. To-day nobody has any invested money; they live on what they can earn from day to day. The man who has no job, unless he is in the public service, is starving. Germany can not pay out this last billion of gold; because of the short crop, a period of famine will soon be at hand, and this billion must be used to buy food for the starving people."

"The first problem is to reestablish production. Germany can pay only through an international loan, and such a loan can be made only if German industries are active. England has a similar problem; she has a million and a half unemployed."

"This is much more serious than would be like conditions in the United States, for England, like Germany, must import food and raw material, while the United States has within itself all needed. For Great Britain this is an enormous economic loss. German workmen must work 10 hours instead of 8 to enable the country to pay its foreign obligation. It is not possible to undertake new obligations. Germany lost 4,000,000 men in the war, her most productive. Now there is too large a percentage of women. Germany must live economically, but she must export, otherwise she is dead."

"Germany has no unemployment, but she has a large number of Government employees who are unproductive. Also a large number of ex-army officers who have been given positions, but with very poor results, because of their lack of training. In four years Germany has set at work 4,000,000 men who were demobilized. Before the war we had no foreign debt. The present figure of reparation talked is 132,000,000,000 gold marks. Before the war the note circulation was 5,000,000,000, now it is 250,000,000,000. The principal difficulty is that Germany can not work to capacity and export her products; if she could she could pay. Germany could pay annually upon an amortization plan about a billion gold marks. But if the United States requires payment of her loans it will destroy the economics of Europe, because the debts are greater than the revenue. Payment can be made only by export of products, and by this influx of cheap goods the United States would lose much more than the total of the debts through shutting down of its factories and unemployment."

"Germany has paid no gold in reparation, but has lost 100,000,000,000 gold marks in 10,000,000,000 paid in kind, 8,000,000,000 in the lost mines, 3,000,000,000 to support the army of occupation, and all the investments in foreign countries, the colonies, and merchant marine. German industry will not place its signature on any paper unless it is to be protected. That is the difference between industry and the Government. German industry knows that first of all we must have food for our workmen, because if they are not fed they will become Bolshevik and the Government can not live. So our first problem is food and labor. Consequently Germany must export, otherwise she can not import the necessary food. The export problem is entirely different from that of the United States. The United States exports only 5 per cent of its production, but we must import all of our raw material, for Germany works on foreign material, so that if we can not export we can not import."

"Before the war there were 60,000,000 people in Austro-Hungary, who gave us one of our best markets. Now they can take nothing. American capital should be invested in these countries and in ours. The billions you loaned during the war went up in smoke. We need much American cotton, but can not pay for it. If Americans will invest in our manufacturing industries they can supply them with raw material. The United States has a great textile industry and produces three-fourths of the cotton manufactures of the world. But Germany has cheap labor. In cotton goods, where raw material costs 80 per cent and labor 20 per cent, we can not compete, but as labor percentage rises we can compete. What Germany needs is a favorable tariff and investment of American capital in our industries."

The deficit in the budget of Germany is hard to figure, as it is hard to figure any form of German finances, because of the constant fall of the mark. The 1922-23 budget shows total receipts of 225,289,000,000 million paper marks, expenditures 430,560,000,000, deficit 205,271,000,000. The expenditures consist of 100,654,000,000 for general administration, 137,374,000,000 for Government undertakings, and 192,532,000,000 for peace-treaty obligations. Germany has no foreign debt aside from reparations. The floating debt amounted to 50,000,000,000 marks while the commission was in Berlin. Currency inflation was increasing as fast as the printing presses could be operated. The value of the mark is to-day less than a quarter what it was then. And yet the ablest financiers insisted unlimited inflation was necessary to keep the wheels of industry turning and save the country from the Russian revolution. With revision of the treaty, a reasonable reparation figure, freedom to export and an international loan, it is quite likely that the gold and securities shipped abroad for safe-keeping will return and economic, financial, and industrial reconstruction take place. The affairs of the nations of Europe is so interdependent that Germany can not fall without shaking all Europe, and when Europe is shaken to its foundations America can not escape scot-free."

An entirely different and rather startling viewpoint upon reparations and allied debts was made known to the commission by an American official, who declined to be quoted.

"The average German workingman," he said, "obtains the food he requires. Government employees and professional men are not as well off. Whoever lived on the income of property has lost it. Divide your personal income by 300 and see what remains. That is the situation. German inflation has been a real confiscation of existing property. Germany is ruled by a socialist government, but leading financiers agree that inflation alone has prevented revolution. An immediate consequence has been that everybody now spends whatever money he gets, feeling that whatever he buys is worth more than constantly depreciating currency, whereas before the war the Germans were economical. Wages and salaries can not be increased to keep pace with the deterioration of the mark. The eight-hour day has decreased production, in the mines for instance, 13 to 15 per cent. The population of Europe has been multiplied by five since the eighteenth century. Each generation has been much larger and has lived much better, through great development of industrial and agricultural activity. Now, the whole machinery has gone to pieces and it is necessary to reconstruct it."

"The average German did not want the war but was influenced by propaganda. There is more bitterness and hate than before the war. Every country expects attack from its neighbors. France expects a new attack from Germany, has paid for protection the expenses of the armies of Poland, Serbia, and Rumania, and is on the verge of bankruptcy. In every country you find debt, heavy taxes, poverty. England is refusing credit, for she knows they can not pay. The United States can not remit the debts of Europe, for they would begin immediately upon new armaments. Debts can not be paid in anything but money, and Europe can not pay in money. These debts are a small thing to the money and lives the United States contributed to the war."

"If the nations of Europe would provide by law that no war could be declared for 10 years, and then only by vote of the people, permanent peace would be assured. If we could balance our debts by assuring this result, we would be repaid every dollar. We must remember that the end for which our boys fought has not been reached, but it can be in a few weeks.

"A German manufacturer recently spoke of the wrong done by France to Germany, especially by the negro troops in the occupied regions, and told of the vengeance Germany will some day take against France. I told him to look out of the window and see people going to work under harsh conditions and the general unhappiness of the German people. And then instead of thinking of vengeance I asked him what would he think if the United States would give Germany the opportunity to regain its former prosperity under guaranteed peace. He burst into tears. If your commission's investigations bring the same result as mine you will be able to tell America that Germans are not devils. They have been the victims of propaganda, just as we have been. If Germany falls, France falls, too, and civilization will go back 100 years. Before the financial situation can be stabilized the political situation must be changed, otherwise Europe will spend all of the money it can obtain in armaments.

"I have been in touch with all classes of people and can find only one plan to improve the situation and solve the multitude of overlapping difficulties. The two principal problems are, first, the reparations, and nobody knows how that will be solved. It will be settled not because anybody knows how, but because it must be settled. The second is, European debts to the United States. These debts are enormous, and Europe can not pay them. They owe us $14,000,000,000, and heavy sums to Great Britain. Their taxes are at the breaking point. It is as if the United States had a debt of $150,000,000,000. The German people are great workers, but they can not work efficiently now, because their whole structure has been broken down by the war.

"Here is my plan: We ought to remit all of these debts on condition of limitation of armaments and an end to aggressive war. To do this we must appeal directly to the people over the governments. Not a government in Europe would accept the plan, but 8 out of 10 of every people would vote in favor of no war for 50 years. Under present conditions Europe can not receive credit from us, but if present conditions are removed it would benefit not only Europe but the United States. Your commission can say to the American people that they are entitled to payment, but since they can not be paid in money they must accept payment in the establishing of a state of affairs that will improve trade conditions tremendously. Fifty years of the conditions I propose will give the United States such prosperity as we have never known. Impress this view on the minds of the American people and your mission will be of great value to America.

"France fears Germany; Germany says France has always been her enemy; the more you put them together the worse the situation. Germany says France will attack her as she has done in the past, while Russia with her enormous hordes threatens on the east.

"As to the debts, England can pay, Belgium a little, France, Italy, and the other countries nothing. If England pays, the English people will always cherish a resentment that will create a grave situation and make an enemy out of a friend, because they feel that the war was ours as much as theirs. While the debts of the Allies are known, the German reparations are unsettled and must be modified to an amount she can pay. To determine this is extremely difficult. The only way America can handle and profit by the situation is to use her enormous power in the way I have suggested. I propose that Europe pay every cent of its debt to us, but since they can not pay in money let them pay by putting an end to war and establishing conditions we are anxious to obtain. The best thing for America to do is to create in Europe a large market and keep it without disturbance of war. Let me say to you, do not expect to find a reasonable state of mind in Europe. They are all crazy; shell shocked."

There is nothing new in this proposal. Mr. Frank Vanderlip has discussed it at some length in his "What Next in Europe?" published last spring. His conclusion is emphatic: "If we undertake to find ways in which we might direct European political policy under the threat of enforcing our financial claim, or under the bribe of relinquishing it, I believe we would find this whole field of exploration a fruitless one. Any attempt seriously to enter it would result in involving us in meddling with European political policy. To become so involved is opposed to every American national sentiment. I should abandon the theory that we might cancel the allied indebtedness in exchange for the privilege of imposing certain rules of political conduct upon our debtors. If we should through the cancellation of this indebtedness buy special privileges for our commerce and discriminatory treatment favorable to American business, we would buy something which we ought not to have and something which would in the end plague us infinitely more than it would ever prove to our advantage."

It is extremely difficult for an American, even while sojourning in Berlin, to comprehend the effect of the tremendous inflation upon prices of everyday necessities or luxuries. Some impressions may be informative; conclusions are impossible. Nobody may dare by the greatest flight of imagination to attempt to picture the future. And impressions gained by a brief visit must of necessity be superficial.

A $10 bill purchased 12,658 marks when the commission was in Berlin. To-day, at the last available figures, it would purchase a good deal more. That $10 bill was worth about 400 marks when the American commission visited Berlin in 1913. On the other side of the picture, the 12,658 marks bought for $10 were worth $300 in 1913. The basket of marks secured to pay hotel bills and railroad fare for the commission would have been worth approximately a quarter of a million dollars in pre-war days.

The situation in Germany is a paradox; its like is not recorded in history. It is an invariable economic principle that continuous printing of paper money with nothing behind means financial and economic ruin. Yet the greatest financier in Germany has not only approved but actually encourages this policy of disastrous inflation, because it alone stands between Germany and Bolshevism, and he expresses the hope that so long as revolution can be averted and the workers employed, Germany may eventually, in some incomprehensible way, pull through.

The conditions described to the commission in France were not in evidence. The people are not expensively dressed, the gay night life, undertaken by order of the All Highest, which dominated Berlin in 1913, does not exist. Whatever extravagance there is along this line, whatever patronage is given to cabarets and the Palais du Danse, comes from the pockets of foreigners, not from formerly well-to-do Germans. Instead of the former universal evening dress, at the grand opera were not over a score of men and women in evening dress. Seats in the best loge were $1.30—to foreigners. This is or was, one of the theaters subsidized by the Government. When the Allies decided that under the Versailles treaty subsidies to a theater were a luxury and this money should be used for reparations, prices were raised 400 per cent in order to keep the house open. That as much as possible of this increase might be paid by foreigners it is provided that every German, upon showing his card of identification, shall be rebated two-thirds of this price, so that they can hear grand opera at 5 cents for standing room or 44 cents for the best loge.

At one of the great music halls where the middle class takes its recreation—an enormous place, with hundreds of tables placed close together—admission was a fifth of a cent. One figures taxi rates by multiplying the indicated figure by 80. The charge for a victoria for two for the 2½ mile ride from the pension, where many of the commission were quartered, to the hotel, where were the headquarters, was 9 cents and for a taxi 19 cents. Formal dress suits, tailored, cost $13, silk scarfs and hose 10 cents. We were advised that the proper tip was 10 marks, or less than a cent. A member of the commission exchanged 5,820 marks for 17 Swiss francs and had to pay 300 marks for the 1-franc stamp on his passport. The streets are full of old women begging; when a 100-mark note is dropped in their box they try to fall on their knees in gratitude. It is 8 cents, or was; much less now. Americans are charged all the traffic will bear. At the three or four best hotels an American is charged New York prices. In the shops when an American is recognized at least 100 per cent is added. There are no price marks on goods displayed. They said they never could tell how much the price would be raised the next day.

All of the people who were comfortably situated, living on income from rents or investments, are absolutely ruined. A very capable young man, a high official, who furnished a good deal of information, gave a striking illustration. His father was wealthy. He had invested 200,000 gold marks in Government securities to provide his daughter a dowry and an income. This amounted to approximately $50,000, yielding $1,500 a year, which amply provided for the young lady in Germany. Now this $50,000 investment figures about $167 and yields an income of $5 a year. "I bought a hat like this," said this young man, "in October, 1920, for 250 marks. In April, 1922, I paid 170 marks to have it cleaned and 1,350 for a new one exactly like it. Six weeks later the price was 7,000 marks. In July I paid 80 marks for a pound of butter; to-day it is 380. The mark in 1920 was worth 8 cents; to-day it is worth eight-tenths of a cent. But prices have not gone up ten or thirty times. My salary is 189,000 marks, of which 18,000 is taken in taxes, leaving me 170,000 marks," which then was about $136, leaving him less than $12 a month.

Skilled and unskilled labor receives about the same wage, which is based on the estimated cost of living for a man, wife, and two children. The rate is fixed by a tribunal with one employer, one labor-union man, and a representative of the socialist government. The commission visited the great electric works of Jiemens, Schuckert Co. They have 56,000 employees in the Berlin plant and 34,000 in another plant. Their skilled employees receive 20,000 marks a month—$16. The eight-hour day is in force and they are running three eight-hour shifts. Coal miners and skilled carpenters receive 25,000 to 30,000 marks—$20 to $24. It is generally accepted that an unmarried man can get along lavishly on this wage but that the man with a large family has to economize. Girl stenographers receive from 4,500 to 6,000 marks, $3.40 to $4.80, a month. The ordinary laborer has meat or fish once a week.

House rents have been raised 500 or 600 per cent. Then the Government prohibited a further raise, which has bankrupted owners of houses and apartment and business blocks. You can buy apartment houses for a fifth to a tenth of their cost. Nobody will buy; taxes and expenses make them a liability.

And still factories were working night and day, with equal activity in the fields, in shops, in banks. It is doubtful if one can find anywhere as prosperous appearing a country as that traversed all day long from The Hague to Berlin.

These are the impressions the Germany of to-day offers.

ENGLAND.

Great Britain has balanced her budget, of course. The ax has been swung lustily upon expenditures. The Geddes pruning committee provided a reduction of expenditures of $350,000,000 in the war and $305,000,000 in the civil list. The army was reduced from £106,665,000 in 1921 to £82,300,000 in 1922, the navy from £82,479,000 to £64,884,000, the air force from £18,411,000 to £10,895,000, and the civil service from £379,035,000 to £317,455,000. The commission was advised by treasury officials that instead of a deficit there was a balance of receipts above expenditures of £56,500,000, or $280,000,000, for the first six months of 1922, and that they were perfectly satisfied with the outlook.

Their optimism may be justified. England has accomplished wonders. One might venture to suggest that possibly the British officials do not attach sufficient importance to the great reduction of revenue. Yielding to an overwhelming demand from business interests for reduction of taxation, the income tax was reduced from 6s. to 5s. Upon the basis of the reduced taxation estimated receipts for the current year show the following tremendous decrease from the receipts of last year:

	1921-22	1922-23
Customs.....	$130,152,000	$112,250,000
Excise.....	194,281,000	160,750,000
Taxes.....	521,274,000	445,800,000
Postal Service.....	40,000,000	35,667,000
Special receipts.....	170,805,000	80,000,000
Total revenue.....	1,124,880,000	910,775,000

Estimated decrease in receipts, $214,105,000.

A decrease of a billion dollars in receipts offers a problem that "muddling through" will not handle. In the present state of public sentiment further reductions are likely to follow. Can the British Empire live on its constantly reducing income? Of course it can and will, but the task before its officials is a prodigious one. Corporations have paid less each year since the war. On the other hand, the 5 and 6 per cent war loans are being rapidly funded into long-term securities, some at 3½ per cent, the average 4½ per cent. The situation at present is exceedingly good; the danger, if danger there be, is in the future. The total debt in August, 1922, was £7,737,000,000. The floating debts were reduced during the year from £1,363,586,000 to £905,000,500, a reduction of more than a third. England, like Italy, is entirely ignoring any possible receipts from German reparations and working out her own salvation. There is a very general understanding that the sum demanded of Germany is preposterous, and that the Versailles treaty must be materially changed to give Germany a chance. There is, too, a quite general feeling among bankers and manufacturers in favor of getting together with Germany, settling all controversies, and resuming close trade relations, for these two nations were each the other's largest customer in pre-war days.

Unemployment is a very serious problem in England; there were 1,307,000 unemployed in October receiving Government aid.

The Belgian compromise was characterized in London as "to-morrow-atorium." England understands the situation and the world danger from the present hate and animosity growing out of the Versailles treaty and the impossible reparations, and the feeling is growing daily that the nations must get together and arrive at a definite settlement before the period expires.

British-American trade shows a tremendous balance in favor of the United States. While only 10 per cent of British exports go to the United States, Britain buys from the United States seven times as much as she sells.

At a conference at the American Chamber of Commerce Manager Weeks, of the London branch of the National City Bank of New York, expressed a view that seemed to meet unanimous approval. Mr. Weeks suggested that Congress should give the congressional commission authority to reduce or waive interest on allied debts to the United States; that the United States and Great Britain hold a conference to discuss the international situation; and that later a general conference be called. Since the Allies can not pay the United States in gold or goods, the only other way is credits—an international loan by the United States and Great Britain jointly. If the United States would waive interest it would do away with the present antagonism of the world toward the United States and create friendship. Good will is needed for trade among nations as well as among individuals. The more the United States will lighten the burdens of the world, the better for the United States materially in the long run.

In England as elsewhere German reparations crop up as the fundamental problem. English agriculture is in the dregs. At the great market in London California apples were selling at $1.75 a box, Hood River apples at $2.42. English apples were left on the trees and offered free to any who would pick them. Potatoes were rotting in the ground. A large farmer told the commission he had 200 acres of potatoes; that he would lose 2½ pounds an acre if he marketed them, a total loss of nearly $2,400. Farmers are putting all the money they can raise or borrow into hogs, as this is the only way they can get any money out of their potatoes. All agreed as to the cause of this situation. The tremendous glut in the market—food products from all over the world rotting here—is due to German reparations. These products have always been transhipped into Germany. The German market is closed. Hence the British farmer is ruined; hence Oregon and Washington and California apples and other American food products are sold for less than at home. America as the greatest producer of food products has quite as much interest as England in the situation. Is the effect not noticeable by the American producer and shipper?

The commission held conferences in London with the British Association of Chambers of Commerce—Sir A. Shirley Bonn, president, formerly chairman of the British trade mission to the United States and of the joint British, French, Italian, and Belgian missions—the British Board of Trade, the British department of overseas trade, the Federation of British Industries, Lloyd's, officials of the British treasury, the American embassy, consulate, and Department of Commerce, the American Chamber of Commerce, and with British and American bankers.

Ambassador Harvey received the commission. Chairman Owens said the commission wished to ask him, if it would not embarrass or involve him, if this is not the time for our diplomatic representatives to speak so that the country may understand in no uncertain way their judgment as to European conditions and problems. Ambassador Harvey smilingly said, "I do not think I would be good at epigrams this afternoon." Chairman Owens then asked as to the suggestion made by another United States diplomat that the allied debts be canceled. Ambassador Harvey replied: "Of course, Congress will not and can not cancel those debts. Our bonds issued against those debts are held not only by our own people but all over the world. They are held in China, Holland, Czechoslovakia. Our Government in offering them for sale declared that back of them as the security of them was the security of the allied debts. The United States will never repudiate an obligation. They talked about a vicious circle. There is no circle. It is a straight line. One end is Germany and the other in the pockets of the people of the United States. England can and will pay." The ambassador made some other characteristic comments not for publication.

SWITZERLAND.

The financial and commercial situation in Switzerland, as well as in Holland, demonstrates the economic interdependence of the countries of the world. Because of chaotic conditions resultant not so much from the war as from the so-called peace treaties, the neutral countries of Europe, as well as the former belligerents, are suffering and almost on the verge of collapse. The Swiss franc has maintained parity; the cost of living and prices generally are high; business and industry are greatly depressed.

The 1921 budget showed a deficit of 133,200,000 francs—receipts, 384,600,000 francs, expenditures, 517,800,000 francs. The 1922 budget shows a slight decrease in the deficit—receipts, 422,200,000; expenditures, 528,600,000; deficit, 106,400,000 francs. It is to be noted that the 1922 deficit equals 25 per cent of the receipts and 20 per cent of the expenditures, a very unsatisfactory situation. A protective tariff went into effect July 1, 1921, which increased receipts about 50,000,000 francs. The total debt of the Swiss Confederation increased from 1,862,856,600 francs, January 1, 1921, to 1,946,100,000, January 1, 1922. To this is to be added the debt of the Government-owned railways—2,283,625,000 francs, making a total of 4,200,000,000 francs, or approximately $840,000,000.

The general business depression which began in April, 1920, continues, notwithstanding the energetic efforts of the Government to protect industry by levying a protective tariff, restricting imports, subsidizing the hotels, and providing unemployment insurance. Unemployment has steadily increased and is expected to continue. Swiss imports from the United States fell off more than 50 per cent in the first three months of this year, from $15,934,746 in the last quarter of 1921 to $7,333,035 in the first quarter of 1922. Of the total imports in these periods foodstuffs amounted to $12,324,420 and $3,882,325, respectively. Thus the great loss to the United States was in foodstuffs. Exports of Switzerland's great watch and clock industry fell from $7,381,545 in the last quarter of 1921 to $5,968,146 in the first quarter of 1922. In this industry the unemployment increased from 5,063 in 1920 to 27,787 December 31, 1921, and 24,579 March 1. The tourist industry is in many parts of Switzerland the leading industry. It has suffered and is suffering tremendous depression, so great that the Government had to dip into the public treasury to keep the hotels open. The falling off of 75 per cent of imports of foodstuffs from the United States is thus explained. Swiss hotel keepers ascribe the lack of tourists to the same fundamental cause to which every ill of the world is ascribed, the German reparations. Wealthy Germans had always flocked into Switzerland and patronized the hotels. Now there are no wealthy Germans, and Swiss hotels are empty. Here is direct line from American producers to the reparations problem, just as English farmers are on the verge of ruin because of the prodigious glut in the London market of produce from all over the world which formerly went into Germany. It may be stated positively that Switzerland has no sympathy with the attitude of France and Belgium and more nearly approximates that of Holland. Germany must prosper if Switzerland is to prosper.

FRANCE.

France was the sufferer from the World War, not Belgium. France suffered tremendously. No matter what happens in Europe, despite the insistence of France that her life and that of civilization depends upon prompt payment of German reparations, France will pull through. But she has a big job before her, and she must change her attitude.

France had under arms one-fifth of her population, she furnished one-fifth of the fighting men on the side of the Allies, she lost one-fifth of her soldiers. This is a greater percentage in each instance than that of either of the other belligerents.

France spent $12,500,000,000 in the war. She suffered property losses of $3,000,000,000 or $4,000,000,000 gold. Her war expenses and property damage amounted to nearly a third of her national wealth, as compared with one-thirteenth for the United States. In addition, France has payment to make of $117,000,000 a year upon pensions, $1,767,000,000 upon interest on her war debt, and $300,000,000 a year on interest to Great Britain and the United States. France financed the war as no country save Great Britain and the United States might do. Still the French Government borrowed from the Bank of France during the war $5,653,000,000 and issued $10,000,000,000 of 5 to 4½ treasury bills. The total of the national debt is to-day approximately $60,000,000,000.

The budget for 1922 included for public debt 13,320,000,000 francs, for military expenses 4,539,000,000, and for civil 6,828,000,000, a total of 24,687,000,000. The revenues were 23,000,000,000, in expected German reparations, which is very unlikely to be paid, leaving a total deficit of nearly 25,000,000,000 francs, or approximately $5,000,000,000 under normal exchange rates, or something under $2,000,000,000 at present varying exchange. The budget for 1923 provides 12,345,000,000 for public debt, 5,035,000,000 for military, and 5,799,000,000 for civil, a total of 23,179,000,000. The revenues are estimated at 19,285,000,000, deducting from which the hoped-for German payments leave a deficit of 26,884,000,000, or $5,400,000,000 at normal exchange. It is to be noted that the French budget deficit is increasing rather than decreasing, largely because of military expenditures, which ought to be practically eliminated. Interest on the national debt reaches appalling figures. It ate up 51 per cent of the national revenue in 1921, 60 per cent in 1922, and 64 per cent in 1923. It is significant that interest on the debt of France to the United States and to Great Britain is given no consideration in the budget. As previously stated in this report, France has no thought of paying this. France is reducing its expenditures, except military and naval, and has increased taxation almost to the breaking point. But to meet these tremendous deficits, the public debt has been increased $9,000,000,000 in three years, and while paper currency has been reduced $64,000,000, national-defense bills or short-term bonds have increased $4,000,000,000.

In spite of this situation, the thrifty French people continue to go down into their stockings and absorb eagerly every government obligation offered. They hold six-sevenths of the entire French debt. Two years ago funding loans of $8,500,000,000 were placed at par. The character of the French people, their wonderful thrift, their absolute faith in the securities of their government, will ultimately save the Republic. And what can be secured from Germany when a reasonable settlement is reached will be a very material help. France is entitled to it. America will uphold the part of right and justice in seeing that she receives it, not by force of arms, as many in France unwisely urge, but by calling a conference and outlining a reasonable settlement.

France has increased taxation to the limit. There have been imposed a general income tax, taxes on income from real estate, from profits and from salaries, wages, pensions, and all earnings. All existing taxes, principally indirect, were largely increased. The total collected by taxation increased from 4,200,000,000 francs in 1914 to 6,200,000,000 in 1917, 12,000,000,000 in 1919, 18,000,000,000 in 1920, and nearly 22,000,000,000 in 1921.

When German troops marched across the border, the Bank of France held a gold reserve of 73 per cent against its circulation. Paper currency increased about 35 per cent to 1920 and has been slightly reduced in the last two years. The bank now holds a specie reserve of 15½ per cent, which is a remarkable showing. The French people again demonstrated their thrift and faith by responding to the appeal of the bank in war days and bringing in exchange for notes 2,500,000,000 francs in gold.

Since 1919, the balance of foreign trade has been reduced from adverse figures of about $1,300,000,000 to practically nothing, although in pre-war years it had been heavy. Trade with the United States, which totaled about $300,000,000 in 1910-1914, had doubled in 1921, with exports of $1,500,000 and imports of $4,500,000.

Because of the fact that the United States, therefore a debtor nation, had become a creditor nation and had absorbed its securities held abroad, because of the continuous flow of gold from Europe to New York to pay for supplies purchased in America, because of the loans made by Europe in America, and because of the tremendous increase of exports from the United States and adverse balance of trade against France increased tenfold, the parity of the franc could not be maintained. It increased from approximately 20 cents during the early war period, when American securities held in Europe were dumped on the New York market, to 22 or 23 cents, and then steadily fell, reaching the low mark of 6½ cents in 1920 and about 7 cents, with continuous fluctuations, since.

The devastated area of France, which suffered not only from the effects of war and enemy occupation but also from ruthless and wanton destruction by the Hun, while comprising only about 6,000 square miles, was the richest industrial district of France, producing 92 per cent of the iron ore, 74 per cent of the coal, 70 per cent of cotton products, 80 per cent of wool products, 60 per cent of the steel, 55 per cent of the flax, 47 per cent of the sugar, and 14 per cent of the wheat. France estimates the loss, including "individual injuries," at $7,250,000,000. France lost 57 per cent of her young and middle-aged men in the war, and other hundreds of thousands were seriously injured.

With rare courage France has undertaken and in large degree carried through the work of reconstruction. Very largely the cruel work of the Hun has been repaired. The visit of the commission to this district demonstrated this. It showed the peasants back on their farms, in many instances living in temporary shacks, but everywhere raising crops to feed the nation. Now, practically all of the agricultural area is under cultivation. France has expended upon this work of reconstruction about 90,000,000,000 francs, or $18,000,000,000, expecting to be repaid in full by Germany. If it could be thus repaid and the United States and Great Britain would kindly forget the billions loaned, France could balance its budget. Neither of these saving conditions will come to pass.

France has received back Alsace-Lorraine, with the greatest body of iron ore in Europe, with the potash mines that gave Germany a world monopoly of potash, and with a wealth of perhaps $4,000,000,000. France also has for 15 years the Saar coal basin, which before the war produced annually 12,000,000 tons of coal, 1,400,000 tons of pig iron, and 2,000,000 tons of steel. It has nearly 600,000 square miles of colonial territory added to its possessions. It is the British opinion that these gains more than offset the entire loss caused by the war. It is perhaps a fair estimate to say that the public wealth of France to-day is as great as it was before the war, about $60,000,000,000. While the total debt of France increased from 33,637,000,000 francs, in 1913, to 267,743,000,000, in 1921, and the foreign debt, included in the above, from nothing to 35,563,000,000, it is the judgment of the commission that France can and will find the way out of its financial difficulties, irrespective of German reparations, but without difficulty if the reparation problem is solved as suggested.

France must reduce its expenditures for defense, and to do this must be assured that she will not be attacked. She must reduce her civil expenses. Her officials and employees drawing salaries from the treasury number 150,000 more than in pre-war days.

The commission made its first study in France. In France the first impression received from French officials and from Americans there resident was the prevailing fear that France would again be attacked by Germany. This is a psychological condition that must be considered. Before there can be a stabilization of world conditions France and Germany must be assured against attack. We believe this is possible without the guaranty of the proposed treaties that Great Britain and the United States should contract to protect France against attack. If the treaty proposing this had been presented to the Senate, it is our belief that it would have been approved. With all faith in and adherence to the traditional policies of America, we believe that under a reasonable settlement France can live and prosper and pay its debts.

The situation in France has been discussed at great length because the attitude of France toward a reasonable settlement of the world problems is to-day the greatest hindrance to world peace.

The International Trade Commission was given every opportunity to learn the attitude of France. It absorbed it; it was not impressed by it. The dominant feeling in France is fear of another attack by Germany. Because of this France maintains an army of 800,000 men and has financed the armies of Poland and neighboring States. These outrageous expenses can be reduced to a minimum and will be if the American principle of justice and righteousness is impressed upon the world.

The commission received every courtesy and assistance from American representatives in France. Conferences were held at the embassy, where Ambassador Herriek's absence—who had been of such great aid to the American commission in 1913—was greatly deplored, at the consulate, at the American Chamber of Commerce, at the International Chamber of Commerce, and with the minister of commerce of the French Government.

From the mass of facts and figures an analysis can be best obtained by quoting Dr. Chas. D. Westcott, United States economist consul. Upon instructions from Secretary Hughes, Doctor Westcott furnished a report, which may be epitomized as follows:

"There is a general though gradual improvement in French production, transportation, and commerce in 1919-1922. Average daily freight-car loadings increased from 30,100 in January, 1920, to 41,800 in April, 1922. Freight on inland waterways increased about 25 per cent. The balance of trade has steadily decreased in its operation against France. In 1919 of 32,210 tons, 71 per cent was imports and 29 per cent exports; in 1920, of 45,740 tons, 63 per cent was imports and 37 per cent exports; and in 1921, of 49,190,000 tons, 55.6 per cent was imports and 44.4 per cent exports. In the first five months of 1922 the excess of imports was 65 per cent in volume and adverse trade balance of 2,657,291,060 francs, or 28 per cent. The cost of living increased by 44 per cent in 1919-20, declined about 10 in 1921, and since then has risen steadily. Production of coal, iron, and steel has steadily increased. Unemployment is not a serious problem. While there has been a gradual industrial recovery, stability has not been reestablished, for while commercial inflation has ceased and deflation begun there can be no restoration of normal economic conditions because fiscal inflation still continues. Thus a group of French stocks showed 65 in January, 1919, 63.8 in April, 58.1, 57.4, and 58.9 in April, 1920, 1921, and 1922, respectively. Railway debentures show a like fluctuation. Paris clearing-house returns show a monthly average of 6,000,000,000 francs in 1914, 14,000,000,000 in 1920, 14,800,000,000 in 1921, and 11,600,000,000 in 1922. The value of the franc in dollar exchange, which is the great hindrance in mutual trade relations at present, declined from 18.3 cents in January, 1919, to 9.1 in December; declined from 9.03 in January, 1920, to 5.91 in December; advanced from 6.32 in January, 1921, to 7.81 in December; and decreased from 8.13 in January, 1922, to 7.80 in July.

"A profoundly disturbing factor is the continued increase of the public debt, already a crushing fiscal burden. 'The enormity of that debt,' declared M. Doumer when Minister of Finances, 'constitutes a grave public danger. Its further increase must be stopped at any cost.' On January 1, 1922, it totaled 328,002,000,000 francs, of which 177,880,144,446 represent increase since the war. It now absorbs in annual interest alone more than half the national revenues.

"Outstanding short-time treasury notes, maturing within a year, amounted to 68,000,000,000. If payment is demanded at maturity instead of accepting new notes, repudiation and insolvency are inevitable. The limit of taxation has about been reached and it is impossible to balance the budget, in default of heavy payments by Germany, without additional loans. Thus fiscal inflation in France, as elsewhere in Europe, proceeds in a vicious circle, which may precipitate at any time a crisis of unforeseen economic and political consequences. Obviously, the situation is one of grave national perplexity, worse confounded by apprehension of the imminent future."

In reply to a direct question whether Great Britain, France, and Germany, if they honestly tried, could not work out the problems of the world, Doctor Westcott said:

"If they tried, Great Britain, France, and Germany, with the aid of the United States, could save the peace of the world. It can not be done without the participation of the United States. France is staggering; it is problematical whether France can stand the strain, France for centuries the bulwark of civilization. France went to her own people and said, 'Germany will certainly pay; Germany will begin paying within one year. We must start rehabilitation immediately.' And so France spent 90,000,000,000 francs in renewing the devastated region, relying upon repayment through German reparations, of which she has not received one dollar. If France fails, we might expect to see the whole Continent of Europe swept by a wave of Bolshevism. What would be the effect on the United States if Europe went down completely? We have our troubles now, probably due to Bolsheviks financed from the imperial reserves of Russia."

Judge Berry, president of the American Chamber of Commerce, declared that in the last three years Germany has shipped all of its money out of the country and that England has done everything to prevent anything being paid to France, under its time-old policy of dividing the Continent so as to prevent there being one too strong country. "I want you gentlemen when you return," he said, "to show what Germany has been doing and to get America to use its influence not to loan money but to make Germany pay. Let America know that Germany can pay and should be made to pay. England knows the situation and is preventing Germany from paying. The Reparation Commission is one of the worst organizations under the treaty. If they had decided the amount at Versailles, Germany would have paid at once. They created this commission and in the meantime Germany evaded payment and got away with all its goods."

Doctor Westcott stated that Germany has sent to the United States, England, and other countries $10,000,000,000; that this statement was made by Stinnes himself.

It was officially declared that the cost of living in 1922 is three times that of pre-war days. Prices in Paris are considerably higher than in New York.

Fear of another attack by Germany and insistence upon payment of German reparations overshadow every question of trade extension.

HOLLAND.

Aside from Switzerland and Sweden, the Dutch unit of value is the only one on the Continent maintaining pre-war parity, or practically so. During the European visit of the commission, the guilder was only a fraction over a cent below par. What keeps it up is rather a mystery, for the financial and economic condition of Holland is neither good nor sound. The Dutch budget for 1921 showed a deficit of 230,000,000 guilders, or about $92,000,000, and for 1922 of 248,000,000 guilders, the deficit equaling nearly 50 per cent of the total revenues. While the total debt on January 1, 1922, was $960,000,000, all held in Holland, during the year loans amounting to $40,000,000 were floated abroad, largely in the United States, making a total debt of approximately $1,320,000,000.

Holland is not pro-German; that does not express it. Holland depends absolutely and entirely upon Germany, according to officials, financiers, and business men, and if Germany fails Holland is doomed. Germany must be prosperous if there is to be a future for Holland. And so it is out of the question for Germany to pay the demanded reparation.

In the Amsterdam district financial and commercial conditions were declared by all authorities to be bad. There were a few who were optimistic enough to say that the tide has turned, some who said that the bottom had been reached; but the majority opinion was that present bad conditions are going to be worse. Although there has been considerable increase in the volume of harbor traffic in 1922 over 1921, the balance of trade is decidedly adverse. In the first six months of 1921 Amsterdam imported 1,300,000 long tons and exported 700,000, while in the first six months of 1922 the imports were 1,800,000 and the exports 800,000. The commodities greatest in volume are coal, grain, minerals, fuel oil, petroleum, stone, tea, tobacco, and lumber. The exports to the United States increased 25 per cent in the first six months of this year, and imports from the United States increased 40 per cent.

Shipping and shipbuilding industries are suffering badly, as all over the world. No improvement is expected. Machinery works are the one exception; they are fairly prosperous. The Fokker airplane factories are booming, chiefly on orders from the United States. The textile industry has weathered the storm. The artificial silk industry has so prospered that an enormous factory has been built and is in operation near Arnhem, shipping its products chiefly to the United States. Most of the new war industries, chemical, clothing, furniture, have collapsed. The banks all had large reserves, which covered their losses, and there have been no failures. Amsterdam is the greatest diamond market in the world. The condition of this industry would indicate improved times in the United States, which takes 75 per cent of the diamonds shipped. There has been an increase of 20 per cent in 1922 over diamond shipments in 1921 to the United States.

German competition, which has been very harmful, is gradually passing, with the exhaustion of German goods manufactured at pre-war prices, and the necessity of German manufacturers paying high prices for imported raw material. The principal reason for the present economic situation is ascribed by everybody to the depreciation and instability of the German mark, for Holland is indissolubly tied up with Germany.

There is a new field opening for American shipments of chemicals, hosiery, underwear, clothing, textiles, rubber goods, and tools and machinery, which have always heretofore come from Germany. The quality of German goods is deteriorating badly, according to Dutch importers, and the same complaint heard elsewhere is voiced that German manufacturers will accept competitive orders at a low figure and then refuse to fill them unless the price is raised. There is noticeable, unlike the situation in Belgium, a growing disposition to do business with the United States. It is manifest in every line of trade. The chief difficulties are the long haul, causing high freights, and the insistence of American shippers upon cash payment instead of giving long credits. By conforming to the terms to which European importers are accustomed, there is a market in Holland for almost every United States export, particularly agricultural machinery, cattle feed, dress goods, electric motors, flour and foodstuffs, garden tools, gas stoves, hardware, hosiery, household articles, kitchen ware, lawn mowers, leather and leather goods, machinery, petroleum, refrigerators, shirts and collars, textiles, tin plate, and paper. Despite her sympathy with Germany there is not the slightest evidence of the unfriendly feeling so manifest in Belgium; on the contrary, Holland is ready to do an increasing business with Uncle Sam.

BELGIUM.

The attitude of Belgium upon German reparations is identical with that of France. Germany must pay in full. The Belgium budget for 1922 shows a deficit of 1,142,150,931 francs, notwithstanding there is figured as revenue 2,500,000,000 francs expected to be received in cash from Germany on reparation account. The public debt of Belgium is more than 34,000,000,000 francs. If Germany fails to make large reparation payments the financial prospects of Belgium are rather gloomy. In fact, the United States acting trade commissioner at Brussels, Mr. Hunt, told the commission that unless Germany pays it will be impossible for Belgium to balance its budget.

Discussing trade conditions, Mr. Hunt said that American exporters do not ascribe the necessary importance to personal knowledge of Belgian importers. American shippers insist upon payment when goods are shipped, while Belgian merchants want to receive and examine the goods before paying. Direct contact between exporter and importer is necessary. The Belgian merchants are men of good character and financially sound, but they want to know the Americans from whom they buy. There is in Belgium a good market for American lumber.

In a conference at the office of the Comité Centrale de l'Industrie, the president, M. Carlier, said that Belgium must import 70 per cent of its food and depends largely upon the United States. But to buy from the United States, Belgians must be given long credit. They are honest and one can know that they will pay their bills. Belgium is like Germany. While the Government faces financial ruin, industry is very prosperous.

It was impressed upon the commission officially that Belgium, in spite of our sympathy and evergenerous aid, has no use for the United States. Belgium imports from the United States just as little as it can; foodstuffs because it can not get them elsewhere. Belgium buys cotton in England at a higher price than it would have to pay in the United States, principally because of personal acquaintance and friendship. Mr. H. H. Morgan, United States consul general at Brussels, said that there is a market in Belgium for a good deal more American products than are now imported, but good propaganda would be necessary, and American agents must come to live permanently in Belgium and come in contact with the life of the people. In 1919 the United States led in imports to Belgium but thereafter Belgium fell into the arms of Germany. In 1921 Germany shipped more goods into Belgium than in 1913. This year France leads, followed by England, Germany, and the United States. In the first four months of 1921, of the total imports into Belgium, amounting to 3,670,000,000 francs, the United States contributed 725,260,000, but of 2,717,000,000 in 1922, our share was only 274,325,000. It is perhaps not hard to understand this, when one considers the insistence of American shippers upon cash on shipping receipts and the willingness of German and British shippers to give nine months' time, and their very close study and adaptation to the real or fancied needs of the buyer.

Another rather significant fact learned in Belgium is that America has no comprehension of the real situation there. Only 1 per cent of Belgium actually emerged from the war in better financial condition than before. The millions poured by Americans into Belgium for relief are unnecessary and wasted. We were assured on high official authority that not more than 30 per cent of this money reaches the people for whom it is intended; it is spent in extravagant balls, on special trains, and similar unnecessary expenditures. The commission was urged to send word to all charitable Americans to stop sending checks to Belgium, that the money could be used to better advantage on home charities. An American lady had been in Brussels, recently, planning to raise $50,000 a month for Belgian orphans, and the Belgians are quite able to care for them.

France was the sufferer. The cost of living is much less than in France, prices in the shops are less, the need of relief is palpably absurd. In Paris the struggle of the nation and the people to pull through is very much in evidence. It is not the old Paris. The wonderful gowns are few and far between. Neither men nor women are well dressed on the street. There are no such symptoms in Brussels.

Belgian industry, from the employers' standpoint, like that of Germany and England, is well organized. The Comité Centrale de l'Industrie includes most of the concerns in 82 different industries. President Carlier explained that he was chairman of an international organization, uniting all of the employers of the world, to counter-balance the international organization of labor.

The commission visited the International University at the Palais de Ville, where are students from various European universities taking postgraduate research work and lectures on cultural subjects. The president, M. Odlet, explained that Belgium resented the location of the League of Nations at Geneva, believing Brussels the proper place for a world capital, so had established this university to unify the world through the realm of intellect.

There is a chance to increase trade with Belgium, but a local Belgian agent is required, with an occasional visit from the American shipper. Long credit instead of cash must be the terms to compete with Germany and England. Business and industry are in good shape and sound. Government finances are in bad shape and unsound, with a slowly increasing inflation and an inevitably decreasing franc.

A memorandum prepared for the commission by Consul General Morgan stated that political unrest, waste, and extravagance in all departments of the Government and the violent fluctuation in exchange have had an unprecedented and depressing influence on the economic situation, and there is a feeling of pessimism and gloom in all industries. Commerce for the first four months of 1922 showed imports of 2,717,239,000 francs and exports of 1,797,287,000, an adverse trade balance of about 9,000,000,000 francs and a decrease of about nine billions in imports and eight billions in exports over 1921. Imports from the United States decreased from 725,262,000 francs in 1921 to 274,325,000 in 1922 and exports decreased from 78,051,000 to 67,211. The total business with Germany was about a billion in the first four months of 1921 and 600,000,000 in 1922. Imports from the United States have steadily decreased from 2,271,832,347 in the year 1920 to 1,106,269,967 in 1921, and will not exceed 800,000,000 francs in 1922. About 40 per cent of imports from the United States are foodstuffs, and two-thirds of that grain. Asphalt, tobacco, lumber, oil cake, cotton, chemicals, leather, and automobiles make up the balance. Belgium is building up a large trade with South America, which is financed by heavy Government credit subsidies.

Belgium's national debt has increased from five billions before the war to forty billions—5,714 francs per capita. The paper circulation has increased from one billion to six and one-half billion francs. The actual specie reserve is about 5 per cent. Government expenditures have increased fivefold. Expenses for national defense increased from 89,000,000 francs in 1914 to 558,000,000 last year. The receipts of the Government for 1919-20 amounted to 4,900,000,000 francs and expenditures to 16,000,000,000, an excess of expenditures of 11,250,000,000. Government expenditures and circulation are steadily increasing. Belgium has spent 615,000,000 francs for reconstruction of private buildings and 96,000,000 for roads and bridges. Belgium was not devastated to anything like the extent reported, only 1 per cent of the country suffered, and that was all in West Flanders. Belgium was as well, if not better off after the armistice as before the war. Two American ships entered the port of Antwerp in 1913. There were 151 in 1919, 362 in 1920, 229 in 1921, and 103 in the first six months of 1922.

Belgium has received in German reparations 1,135,000,000 gold marks in cash and payments in kind of 613,000,000. From this is to be deducted the expense of the Belgian army of occupation, 204,000,000, and expenses of the French and British armies of occupation, 640,000,000, a total of 844,000,000, leaving 904,000,000 gold marks paid by Germany. The Belgium Government claims 13,000,000,000 paid out in reconstruction to be repaid by Germany.

About a year ago the Belgian prime minister stated that the per capita tax was 280 francs, which remains in force. Belgian currency is inflated, now reaching the figure of 6,500,000,000 francs. Exchange has fluctuated between 11 and 15 francs to the dollar, the normal being 5. The balance of trade was 4,000,000,000 francs against Belgium in 1920 and 3,000,000,000 in 1921.

ITALY.

There is an entirely different attitude and a cheering atmosphere in Italy. Italy has cleaned house. In Italy nothing was heard about reparations and there was no crying about the debt to the United States. If Germany pays something, well and good, it will help. If not, Italy will work out her own salvation through the wisdom of her statesmen and the thrift and economy of her people. She owes billions to America. It is an honest, honorable debt, and it will be paid honestly and honorably. She can not pay now, but she will keep on digging until she can. All she asks is that if America makes concessions to other of the Allies, the same shall apply to Italy. In all conferences held by the commission in Italy there was no allusion to reparations or allied debts.

A convincing proof of the sincerity and wisdom of her policy is the fact that since the war Italy has reduced her budget deficit from twenty-one billions to six billions, a record diametrically different from that of any other continental nation, and one to which England herself may accord due respect. Two incidents laid the foundation for the very sympathetic and friendly spirit in which the commission studied Italian conditions; one was the extreme cordiality of its reception and the other was the fact that at Rome, at the International Institute of Agriculture, where a formal reception was tendered upon arrival, the American commission of 1913 was welcomed by their majesties of Italy at a ceremony probably unique, with every civilized nation officially represented, and bidden Godspeed by them and the great institute that binds the world in ties of friendly cooperation. A reminder by officials of the institute of the great accomplishment of the commission in 1913 strengthened the hope that something of value might be accomplished in 1922.

At the reception Baron de Bildt, delegate from Sweden, officiated, assisted by Minister Lao, delegate from Portugal; Señor De Campos, delegate from Brazil; and M. Rjon, delegate from Holland. The general secretary of the institute, with chiefs of all divisions and their respective staffs, participated, with representatives of the American Embassy and consulate, the Italian sections of the International Chamber of Commerce, the Rome Chamber of Commerce, the General Federation of Italian Agriculture, the Commercial Industrial Union, several other industrial and agricultural organizations, leading Italian journals, and the foreign press.

In his address of welcome, Baron de Bildt paid a high tribute to the late David Lubin, of California, founder of the institute, which he said always kept his chair empty and wreathed in immortelles.

Chairman Owens, in acknowledging the greeting, said that he had the honor at the moment the bust of David Lubin was unveiled in the institute to present to the Secretary of Agriculture at Washington a portrait of Mr. Lubin, a duplicate by the same artist of the portrait in the institute.

In a conference at the American Embassy, presided over by Mr. McLean, commercial attaché, and later by Mr. Gunter, chargé d'affaires, Mr. McLean explained that Italy emerged from the war with a large debt and industry developed far beyond existing needs, which made difficult the problem of returning to normalcy. The economic crash caused by deflation came in Italy several months later than in America, but was no less severe. The improvement now apparent in the United States has not yet come to Italy, but the bottom has been reached and the tendency is toward improvement. Italy is an agricultural country, so that the business depression, while very hurtful to industry and commerce, is not felt by agriculture to any extent.

While an agricultural country, Italy's production is low. It raises only two-thirds the wheat needed, and is short of all raw materials. Three-fourths of the wheat imported comes from the United States. Next in importance is cotton, practically all of which comes from the United States. The need of foodstuffs and raw materials causes an unfavorable trade balance. Before the war this was about 1½ to 1. It increased greatly, but now is steadily decreasing. The invisible elements to balance are money sent home by Italian emigrants and the tourist industry. After the war both were greatly reduced, but remittances from abroad are now two or three times pre-war, and foreign tourists about as before.

Exchange has greatly injured imports from the United States, because Italy finds it advantageous to buy in European countries having a currency more depreciated than her own. Wheat, cotton, mineral oil, steel, and iron constitute 89 per cent of American imports. The market is stable. Mr. McLean said his principal task has been to find markets for other American products.

If Italy had coal and iron, it would be in much better condition. It has vast supplies of hydroelectric power, which can be developed, but is developing very slowly for lack of capital. Agricultural production is intensive in high degree, with greater yield per acre than in America, but can not be increased to meet requirements. The hydroelectric development alone has interested American capital. A bill is pending to exempt from taxation foreign capital invested in increasing Italian production and will become a law.

All the principal railways are Government owned. Of the greatest budget deficit of 6,000,000,000 lire the railways are responsible for 1,000,000,000 lire. There is a strong and growing sentiment to take the Government out of industrial business, but it is hard to see how it can get rid of the railways, because it would be difficult to distribute them among a number of private corporations, and no one company could take them all over.

Asked if American interests by extending credit in lire to Italy would not profit largely by the increase in value of the lire to approximate its former parity, Mr. McLean said he had lived in Italy three years and was an optimist, but he feared the appreciation of the lire would be very slow. What is far more important is to stabilize exchange. A rapid appreciation would be harmful. Italy now has 18,000,000,000 to 19,000,000,000 paper lire, as against 3,000,000,000 before the war. There is no thought of repudiation. The Government owes 215,000,000,000 lire. If the value should increase rapidly to twice its present value, this debt would be doubled, the laborer ought to accept one lire in place of two, and the Government tax should be reduced one-half. Taking exchange for a year, the average has been about the same, although the fluctuation has been great. The gold reserve is limited, but remains stable. The currency has been reduced, but in place there has been an issue of 30,000,000,000 short-term bonds, at first at 6 per cent interest, then 5 per cent, now 4½ per cent.

Asked as to German reparations, Mr. McLean said that is the great problem of the world to-day, and he hesitated to speak of it. The policy of Italy has been wise not to take into account any possible reparation, but unfortunately she has not taken into account her debts. She owes 22,000,000,000 lire, at present exchange about $1,500,000,000, which is greater than the total revenue of Italy.

There are about 600,000 unemployed. Wages are five or six times pre-war, which is a greater increase than that in the cost of living. There is an 8-hour day. The average wage is 30 lire per day for machine work, 25 for average labor, or $1.35 and $1.10. Before the war the wage was about 60 cents a day. Italy must not be grouped with the nations that have lost control of their economic situation. Her condition is better than that of France.

Compared with the countries to the north a study of Italian conditions is gratifying. The Government is making every effort to balance the budget, while courageously charging all expenditures for reconstruction and pensions directly to the regular budget, instead of carrying some reparation fiction. With equal courage taxes have been raised enormously. Direct taxes, which were 558,000,000 lire in 1913, now bring in 4,300,000,000, taxes on fiscal monopolies increased from 1,067,000,000 to 4,090,000,000, indirect taxes from 657,000,000 to 1,700,000,000, and business taxes from 160,000,000 to 1,000,000,000. Further, receipts from direct and indirect taxation for the first eight months of 1922 showed an increase of 55 per cent over the same period in the previous year. The deficit in the budget for the next fiscal year is estimated by the minister of the treasury at 4,000,000, that for the current year is 6,500,000, that for the preceding year 9,680,000, a gratifying reduction. The total public debt, including bank notes, increased from 107,238,000,000 to 113,930,000,000 in the fiscal year recently closed. This increase was in treasury bonds. Circulation decreased 661,000,000.

Prices in the shops are reasonable; Italy is an excellent place for tourists to shop. Cost of living is not high. There are many very promising openings for American capital. There is vast power to be developed, vast areas of land to be reclaimed, the intensive cultivation of which will enable Italy to come much nearer to self-support, to overcoming the adverse trade balance, and will greatly improve her general economic condition. Far more than any country in Europe, Italy invites and welcomes American investment and commerce. Even Germany, begging for American money, declines to allow American investors control or important share in direction of industries, but offers only interest on bonds. Italy offers what appeals to the investor, full participation and control proportionate to the investment. America may well study Italian offerings. The commission was advised that a prominent Italian financier was leaving for the United States about the time the commission returned, with papers in his pocket to complete a proposition which entailed investment of $100,000,000 of American capital.

In considering the economic possibilities of Italy it must be borne in mind that Italy is the natural geographic center for trade in the Mediterranean basin. In Albania, Greece, Smyrna, Georgia, Turkey, Syria, Palestine, Rhodes, and Egypt is a population of 40,000,000. With world peace there will develop a largely increased purchasing capacity. Italy has the privileged position, with the largest industrial plant in the basin, cheap power, and a population of 40,000,000 industrious, frugal, and intelligent workers. Italy has a heavy adverse balance of trade with the United States, Italy serving as an industrial base and a traffic depot. By developing Italian industry, the United States can secure a large customer, for her 40,000,000 can become large consumers of American goods, and with Italian cooperation there is open an important trade in Mediterranean markets.

Italy is developing and enlarging her ports, as was demonstrated by a personal investigation by the commission. A system of internal waterways now being completed will place Milan and the industrial centers of Lombardy and Benetia in direct water communication with the sea. American enterprise is taking a large part in the development of the port of Palermo. The electrification of railways now under way offers a field for profitable American cooperation. An assembling plant for American agricultural machinery—to decrease duties largely—with repairs and manufacture of parts could be profitably established. With an assembling plant at, say, Trieste, there would be a large market for low-priced American automobiles, as Italy manufactures only very high-priced cars, largely sold abroad. A large American garment manufacturer in southern Italy, using the product of the Italian cotton mills, would find a ready market and also increase the demand for American cotton. The labor monopoly has been broken in all the ports.

The prevailing sentiment in Italy is for good government and fair play to business and industry.

Italy stands for European peace and reconciliation, reduction of armaments, an era of peace and productive activities. All these things appeal to Americans. It is also significant that on November 10 of this year the new Fascist premier, Mussolini, called in the American correspondents and announced to them that Italy wishes to and hopes to pay its debt to America. "It is an honor debt we intend to make every effort to pay. Italy will ratify at once the Washington disarmament treaty."

THE VERSAILLES TREATY AND THE GERMAN REPARATIONS.

The treaty restores Alsace-Lorraine to France and deprives Germany of considerable territory, principally its greatest agricultural areas in Silesia and Poland, and requires Germany to renounce all favorable provisions in treating with the Grand Duchy of Luxemburg.

Germany is forbidden to maintain or construct fortifications on the left bank of the Rhine or on the right bank west of a line 50 kilometers east of the river or to assemble troops in this territory.

Germany cedes to France the coal mines in the Saar basin and all rights to the great potash mines in Alsace-Lorraine and to the allied and associated powers all rights in the territory outside its boundaries and all its overseas possessions. All rights in China are ceded to China.

The military force is limited to 100,000 men, with a specified amount of munitions, arms, and equipment. The use, manufacture, and importation of poisonous gas is prohibited, and Germany is required to disclose to the Allies the nature and mode of manufacture of all explosives and chemical preparations used in war. Compulsory military service is abolished. Military schools are limited in accordance with the reduced army. Schools, clubs, and all associations are prohibited from instruction in or use of arms. All fortifications west of a line 50 kilometers east of the Rhine are to be destroyed. The navy is limited to 6 battleships, 6 light cruisers, 12 destroyers, and 12 torpedo boats. The armed forces must not include any military or naval air forces. Germany is required to compensate civilians of the allied and associated powers for all damage done, to reimburse Belgium for all money borrowed by Belgium from the allied and associated powers up to November 11, 1918, and to pay whatever reparation is fixed by the Reparation Commission. All German merchant ships 1,600 tons and upward are ceded, half interest in ships between 1,000 and 1,600 tons, and quarter interest in steam trawlers and other fishing boats.

A specified number in thousands of horses, cattle, sheep, and goats is to be delivered to France and Belgium; to France 7,000,000 tons of coal a year for 10 years, and an amount equal to the difference between the production of the Nord and Pas de Calais mines before the war and during the 10 years; to Belgium 8,000,000 tons of coal a year for 10 years; to Italy an average of 7,000,000 tons a year for 10 years; to Luxemburg an amount of coal equal to the pre-war consumption of German coal and other quantities of other products as specified.

Imports from or exports to allied or associated States shall pay no higher duty or charge than like goods from any other country, nor may there be any other discrimination.

The Reparation Commission provided that Germany should pay 132,000,000,000 gold marks, or $30,000,000,000. There have been a number of revisions, and the so-called Belgian compromise of September provided a brief moratorium. Briefly, the payment is to be made in three bond issues of 12, 38, and 82 billions of marks.

[Letter from Dr. Harry Pratt Judson, president of the University of Chicago, and report from Dr. Eliakim H. Moore.]

NOVEMBER 9, 1922.

MR. CLARENCE J. OWENS,
Southern Commercial Congress, Congress Hotel, Chicago, Ill.

MY DEAR MR. OWENS: Herewith I am returning the material you sent me with regard to the proposed recommendation of the Southern Commercial Congress relating to the payment of indebtedness and reparations by certain European powers. I am also inclosing the official report to me on the proposed financial payments by the head of our department of mathematics. Prof. Eliakim H. Moore is one of the eminent mathematicians of the country.

Very truly yours,

HARRY PRATT JUDSON.

THE UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO,
DEPARTMENT OF MATHEMATICS,
November 8, 1922.

To the PRESIDENT.

MY DEAR DOCTOR JUDSON: In response to the question recently submitted to me on behalf of President Clarence J. Owens, of the Southern Commercial Congress, I report as follows:

The sum of $1,000,000.00, with interest at 3 per cent per annum, (may) will be amortized by—

Sixty-five annual payments of $35,000.00 each and a final payment at the end of the sixty-sixth year of—

$28,186,297.2295

The residue at the end of 65 years, $28,336,210.9024, with interest for the sixty-sixth year, $850,086.3271, make the final payment stated.

These figures, which have been with care determined in cooperation with my colleague, Mr. W. D. McMillan, an expert in the use of the calculating machines may be relied upon as quite correct. They exceed the corresponding figures found in the table submitted by President Owens by—

$0.0132

$0.0127

$0.0005

These are the essential figures of that table.

Yours very truly,

ELIAKIM H. MOORE.

(1) That an international conference of national banking interests and delegates of Government be called to adopt a plan of action as to a moratorium and a plan of amortization in the settlement of inter-allied debts and German reparations.

(2) That an international tariff conference be called to consider the nonpartisan revision of tariff schedules to remove barriers to foreign commerce.

(3) That the United States laws be so amended as to coordinate the agencies of the United States Government at home and abroad as they relate to the foreign service of the United States.

(4) That it is desirable for a conference of the diplomatic and consular officials of the United States and Europe for the purpose of adopting plans of action as to a Pan-European policy.

(5) That the policy of the United States be so changed that representatives in foreign service be instructed to submit constructive criticism upon economic subjects without partisan bias and the fear of executive reprimand; be it further

Resolved, That the conference approve the amortization tables prepared by the International Trade Commission for the settlement of German reparations and interallied debts, the said tables having been verified as to their mathematical accuracy by the department of mathematics of the University of Chicago; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of the report of the International Trade Commission, together with the amortization tables, be forwarded to the President of the United States, the Departments of State, Treasury, and Commerce of the United States Government, and to the Congress of the United States.

2. Resolved, That the convention recognizes the desirability in the interest of agriculture and industry of the revision and amendment of the present immigration law, so as to make possible the admission to the United States of the number of workmen and agriculturists that are actually needed; and that the problem be intelligently submitted to the officials of the Government of the United States in order that the law may be so amended as to raise the quota in the interest of industry and agriculture above the 3 per cent stipulated in the law, and that the unused quota of countries be distributed among other countries whose quota have been reached; and be it further

Resolved, That the law be so amended as to provide for the intelligent distribution of the immigrants to industry and agriculture in the United States.

3. Whereas the Southern Commercial Congress initiated the plan for rural credits in America; and

Whereas the American commission organized by the Southern Commercial Congress made an investigation in Europe, and upon its report is based the present Federal farm loan act; and

Whereas it is now recognized that a further step must be taken in the financing of American agriculture: Therefore be it

1. Resolved, That the law be so amended as to include a system of short-time credits.

2. That Congress be urged to amend the provision of the farm loan act so as to increase the lending limit of the law from $10,000 to $25,000.

4. Whereas the Department of Education of the United States is inadequately supported and is a minor bureau of the United States Department of the Interior; and

Whereas all other nations of the world maintain ministers of education in the executive cabinet of the respective governments; and

Whereas the United States was given evidence in the lack of general education in the United States as exhibited by the examinations in the selective draft for the World War; and

Whereas education is of so basic an importance to America: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Congress of the United States be urged to provide for a department of education in the Cabinet of the President of the United States on a parity with Agriculture, Commerce, and Labor.

5. Whereas the Bureau of Public Health of the United States is lodged as a minor bureau in the United States Treasury Department; and

Whereas the public health is of first importance in the building of the economic life of the Nation: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Congress of the United States be urged to provide through legislation for a department of health in the Cabinet of the President of the United States on a parity with Agriculture, Commerce, and Labor; be it further

6. Resolved, That the Congress of the United States be urged to restore to the law creating the War Finance Commission the provision as to financing foreign trade transactions; and be it further

Resolved, That the Government consider ways and means for extending credit to the countries of Europe for the surplus of American agriculture.

Resolved further, That agencies of private businesses in America be called upon to join in every possible way in the extension of credit to European countries in their purchase of surpluses of American crops.

6. Whereas the plan to export our surplus farm crops on a credit has been indorsed by the annual convention of the American Farm Bureau Federation at Atlanta, Ga., by the Mississippi Valley Association at Kansas City, by the National Farmers' Grain Dealers Association at Omaha, by the Farmers' National Council, by the National Board of Farm Organizations, including in its membership the Farmers' Union and a number of other important farm organizations, and by the President's agricultural conference at Washington;

Whereas this plan promises the farmers quicker and fuller relief than any other means that have yet been suggested; and

Whereas business men will be benefited as much indirectly as the farmer will be helped directly by this action: Be it

Resolved, That the Southern Commercial Congress, at its fifteenth annual convention, most heartily indorse this plan and take whatever steps as seem practical to secure its enactment into law.

7. Whereas the commercial progress of the United States will be materially advanced by the development of water transportation; and the building of canals connecting the rivers and lakes and the Atlantic Ocean with the Mississippi River and the Gulf of Mexico will also add to the safety of our country; and

Whereas a bill has been introduced in Congress, asking for a resurvey of a proposed canal route from Cumberland Sound to the Mississippi River, and a canal connecting those bodies of water would be of inestimable value to commerce and to the Government, providing an all-inland protected route where barges and other vessels would carry return loads in either direction from the upper Mississippi and the Great Lakes to the Gulf and South Atlantic ports every day in the year, and said canal would be wholly within the boundaries of the United States; and the eastern terminus at Cumberland Sound would provide a bunker coal port, only 3 miles from the open sea, and large anchorage area never closed by ice, where ocean-going vessels could coal and secure cargoes for Europe and South America and other points at great saving of time and expense, and avoiding the delays and congestion at northern ports: Therefore be it

Resolved, That this organization give its indorsement and support to the project known as the Atlantic-to-Mississippi Canal, connecting Cumberland Sound with the Mississippi River, to the end that this all-American canal may be constructed at the earliest practicable date after the report on the resurvey has been submitted to Congress in the manner governing such matters; be it further

Resolved, That the Southern Commercial Congress approves the plan to connect by waterways the Great Lakes and the Gulf of Mexico by way of the Mississippi River; and be it further

Resolved, That the congress approve the proposed plan of connecting the Great Lakes to the Atlantic Ocean by way of the St. Lawrence River. (See typed resolution attached, marked "B.")

We urge immediate extension of an arm of the sea to mid-continent through the improvement of the St. Lawrence River for the passage of ocean-borne commerce in and out of the Great Lakes without breaking bulk, and that the same be done jointly by the Governments of the United States and Canada substantially according to plans submitted by the International Board of Engineers and as recommended to the two Governments by the International Joint High Commission, to whom the project was submitted by the Governments for examination and report; be it further

Resolved, That the Southern Commercial Congress, in annual convention, hereby appeals to the Congress of the United States to perpetuate the Great Lakes Naval Training Station and that no steps whatsoever will be taken by Congress to limit or curtail the usefulness of this institution; be it

11. Resolved, That the Congress of the United States be urged to pass a reclamation law that will be national and nonsectional and include not only the irrigation of arid lands of the West but also the drainage of swamp and overflow lands and the development of cut-over lands and rock lands or any meritorious project anywhere; be it

12. Resolved, That the Congress of the United States be urged, in whatever legislation may be passed in the interest of the American soldier and sailor, that the plan include options wherein not only money but land settlement and development be considered; be it

13. Resolved, That the Congress of the United States be urged to develop through legislation the further use of the truck through parcel post of the Post Office Department in direct dealing between dealer and consumer as a further auxiliary to the solution of the problem of transportation in America.

14. Whereas the International Institute of Agriculture in Rome, Italy, was founded by David Lubin in America; and

Whereas the institute to-day is an economic league of nations comprising 64 countries allied under treaty; and

Whereas the institute has rendered a distinguished service to America and the world in the development of agriculture; and

Whereas since the death of David Lubin the policy of the United States Government has been to make temporary appointments of American delegates to the institute; and

Whereas there is evidence that the United States Government has failed to sympathetically support the institute; Therefore be it

Resolved, That this question be brought to the attention of the President of the United States, the members of his Cabinet, and the Congress of the United States, that the international institute may be understood and its service valued and adequately supported.

15. Whereas it is known that foreign countries in their commercial expansion have secured their prestige and commercial power under the plan that trade follows the loan; Therefore be it

Resolved, That the business interests of America be urged to consider ways and means for the extension of loans to foreign countries with the object of competing for an adequate and reasonable division of the foreign commerce of the world and therefore aid in the establishment of the American merchant marine.

17. Whereas the Consular Service of the United States Government is of great importance in the promotion of business relations with foreign countries; Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Congress of the United States be urged to make provision for the further extension of the Consular Service to not only include other strategic points in foreign countries but also to enlarge the scope of the work of the consulates now established; be it further

Resolved by the Southern Commercial Congress, That an indorsement be given to the activities of the United States Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, a service that is engaged in practical plans of action for the extension of American business.

(Paper by General Ryan.)

"We believe that no greater duty exists in America to-day than to contribute in practical manner to the development and maintenance of an orderly world.

"We realize that the problem is complex, and that its difficulties are not fully understood by the mass of our people; nor are they in accord concerning a solution of it.

"We believe that whatever form our contribution of effort toward permanent peace should take, it will be greatly strengthened by a better understanding of the problem in all its phases and by the extent to which our people are interested in support of whatever may be proposed.

"We are impressed by the inadequacy of organization throughout the country for the intelligent development of the needed understanding and the determination of a proposed course of action to be submitted to Congress for its action.

"We are impressed as well with the gravity of the problem because of the intensive and almost unestimated preparations which all the great powers are making for the next war.

"We therefore believe that associations and other forms of organizations throughout the country which exist for the development of a national policy in furtherance of world peace should by concerted action create and develop a superorganization in which they shall be represented by their delegates. That the functions of this new organization should be the development of an official leadership, the spread of an understanding of the problem among its constituent membership and through the people generally, and the expansion of its own organization to meet the purposes of its existence. Such organization should be nonpolitical in leadership and policy, and when adequately developed for the purpose should, with the support of all member bodies, apply to Congress for Federal incorporation and recognition as a permanent body authorized to make an extended survey of the problem of world peace in all its phases, being authorized for that purpose to have access to relevant data in all Government departments and the assistance of officers of the Army and Navy detailed by request for the purpose.

"Such Federal corporation should be authorized to function for the Government in making a survey of the peace problem, somewhat as the Emergency Fleet Corporation was authorized to function for the Government in its special field.

"Specifically, it should be authorized upon completion of its survey to formulate a project recommended to Congress for adoption as the solution of the problem from the American standpoint and as the American policy in relation to organization for peace.

"That copies of this resolution be mailed by the secretary to all persons and organizations believed to be actively interested in the problem of world peace."

19. Whereas the Southern Commercial Congress held a conference at Muscle Shoals on the subject of the development of Muscle Shoals; and

Whereas 27 States were represented officially in the said conference; and

Whereas said conference unanimously and unqualifiedly went on record approving the proposal made by Henry Ford: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Southern Commercial Congress in the fifteenth annual convention assembled hereby further ratifies the action of the former conference and urges the Congress of the United States to promptly accept the proposal of Henry Ford; be it further

Resolved, That this convention expresses hearty thanks to Dr. Clarence J. Owens for his untiring and loyal services for the past 15 years as the directing executive of this organization and more particularly as president of the Southern Commercial Congress. He deserves our gratitude for the accomplishments of the congress not only in the interest of the South but of the Nation.

JOHN G. RICE,

Chairman Committee on Resolutions.

ORDER FOR RECESS.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business to-day it take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President—

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will not make the hour 11 o'clock. Yesterday morning we tried that, and we were 23 minutes in getting a quorum here. It is very hard for Senators to do the routine morning work that is incumbent upon every Senator and get here at 11 o'clock. I think it is a great hardship, and I hope the Senator will make the hour 12 o'clock.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I was about to say that there are a number of Senators who have committee engagements. The committees meet generally at 10 o'clock, and we can not very well finish the work that is before us if we are to meet at 11. I hope the Senator will change the hour.

Mr. CURTIS. Then I will modify my request so as to ask that when the Senate concludes its business to-day it take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ELI N. SONNENSTRAHL.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 1280, Order of Business No. 1009. This bill gives the right to Eli N. Sonnenstrahl to go to the United States District Court for the Eastern District of New York to prosecute a claim against the Government for commandeering some beans that he had imported from Europe. It simply permits him to go to court to press his claim.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not find any No. 1009 on my calendar.

Mr. CALDER. It is there.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I understand that the bill refers the matter to the court.

Mr. CALDER. It just permits him to prosecute a claim in the District Court for the Eastern District of New York.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the title of the bill.

The READING CLERK. A bill (S. 1280) for the relief of Eli N. Sonnenstrahl.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the claim of Eli N. Sonnenstrahl, of Brooklyn, N. Y., for such further sum as he may be entitled to recover, as added to the amount he has already received, for certain beans commandeered by the Navy Department, at San Francisco, Calif., on or about February, 1918, may be sued for and submitted to the United States District Court in and for the Eastern District of New York, and said court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine such suit and to enter a judgment or decree for such amount and costs, if any, as shall be found to be due against the United States in favor of said Sonnenstrahl upon the same principles and measures of liability as in like cases under section 10 of the Lever Act, and with the same rights of appeal: Provided, That suit shall be brought and commenced within four months from the date of the passage of this act.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the amendment of the committee authorizes the court "to enter a judgment or decree for such amount and costs, if any," as it may find due.

Mr. CALDER. That is the usual practice, and the way these bills come from the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SMOOT. It may be with the district court. I am not positive of that, but I know it is not with the Court of Claims. I know that we insist upon that provision going out of every bill where the matter is referred to the Court of Claims; but as this case goes to the United States district court, I am not positive about it.

Mr. CALDER. I am quite sure that is the practice.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, it seems that this claimant has already received a certain amount for the beans themselves. There is some extra amount that he claims now, is there?

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, we passed an act in the Congress in 1917 which provided that when there was any dispute over the value of property commandeered by the Government the man who owned the property should accept 75 per cent of the value of the goods and be permitted to go to court to collect the balance of it. In the letter accompanying the report I observe that the Assistant Secretary of the Navy quotes this language from the act of August 10, 1917:

* * * If the compensation so determined be not satisfactory to the person entitled to receive the same, such person shall be paid 75 per cent of the amount so determined by the President, and shall be entitled to sue the United States to recover such further sum as, added to said 75 per cent, will make up such amount as will be just compensation for such necessities or storage space, and jurisdiction is hereby conferred on the United States district courts to hear and determine all such controversies.

This is one of those cases where, during the war, the Government commandeered private property.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The first question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield for a question?

Mr. CALDER. I will.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Why should not this claim be sued for in the Court of Claims, as all other claims are?

Mr. CALDER. This claim comes under those provided for in the bill passed on August 10, 1917. Under the law, where the Government commandeered property needed for war purposes it was provided that the man who owned the property should accept 75 per cent of the value of the property where there was a disagreement between the Government and the claimant, and then that he should have the right to sue the Government for the balance of the money in the district courts. I will say to the Senator that I have read from the law, and if he will read that quotation from the law he will find that special provision is made in the statute for a case of this kind, and the Committee on Claims has followed the usual practice.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Why does the claimant need this special act, if the court is given jurisdiction by the act of 1917? The extract from the act of 1917 to which the Senator calls attention expressly states that "jurisdiction is hereby conferred on the United States district courts to hear" such cases as are mentioned.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I am under the impression that under the statute it is necessary for a reference to be made of these cases by act of Congress. That is my impression. We are following the usual practice, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, before I came to Congress I had a good many cases against the United States, both in the Court of Claims and in the district courts, and I do not know of any reason for a special act such as this unless there is something very peculiar in the case. That is what I should like to find out here.

Mr. GEORGE. I would like to ask a question. In the settlement with the Navy Department was not such sum as was paid taken in full accord and satisfaction of the debt?

Mr. CALDER. No; it was not. It was accepted as 75 per cent of the value of the goods. I might say that the Navy Department admits that the price which the man has received, $22,000, was less than he should have been paid, and they have since offered him $472 additional. The claimant contends that that amount is inadequate and unjust to the extent of about $4,000, and the bill as amended is aimed to enable him to institute suit in the United States district court to determine the compensation to which he is justly entitled. We are following a statute enacted by Congress to cover cases of this character.

Mr. SMOOT. He has had more than 75 per cent.

Mr. CALDER. He contends he has not. The Navy Department admits he has not, and they offered to give him $472, but he claims that does not compensate him for his losses. The Government runs no risk.

Mr. FLETCHER. The question raised by the Senator from Pennsylvania is this, If the claimant has that right under the law, why pass a special act to give him the right?

Mr. CALDER. This is a recommendation from the Committee on Claims. It is approved in a letter from the Navy Department, which I hold in my hand. I assume the Committee on Claims know what they are doing. That seemed to be the only course to pursue.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. If it is in order to object now to the present consideration of this bill, I do object, because I think we ought not to consider it until the committee report is printed and placed on our desks and we have a chance to see it.

Mr. CALDER. If the Senator from Pennsylvania objects, I am perfectly willing to have it go over so that he can look over the matter and convince himself that it is in proper form.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be laid aside.

RIVER AND HARBOR IMPROVEMENTS.

Mr. STANFIELD. Mr. President, on January 23 the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] inserted in the RECORD an editorial from the Chicago Tribune. In part the editorial read:

In the palmy days of the rivers and harbors pork-barrel appropriations used to run to about forty millions. It is something of a shock, therefore, to learn that the chairman of the House Rivers and Harbors Committee asks for $56,539,910.

I am somewhat surprised that any Member of Congress, knowing the care with which river and harbor improvements are selected and recommended for improvement during these later years, should confuse this system with what in the olden days became offensively known as the pork-barrel system, when projects were never examined by engineers, recommended by the War Department, or in any other way carefully gone into, but for which money was appropriated because of the influence of the Congressman of that district and his power to organize and combine with the Representatives from other districts in sufficient numbers to secure Federal money for river and harbor improvement in their several districts, some of which were entirely unworthy and resulted in a waste of money and the scandalizing of that system.

Under the system of selecting rivers and harbors for improvement now prevailing it is first necessary for Congress to authorize a careful survey of the proposed project by competent engineers under the direction of the War Department.

If the Army engineers recommend such project as feasible and worthy of improvement, then the matter is brought before Congress, the project and the report of the engineers, together with such additional evidence as may be brought before the committee, sometimes leads the committee to recommend the project be authorized, and sometimes it does not. Then the House passes upon the recommendations of the committee and the bill carrying these authorizations goes to the other branch of Congress, where it and every project is again carefully scrutinized by a committee and the recommendation of this committee submitted to the body, where it is either adopted or rejected, and finally the bill goes to the President for his approval.

Any project that can justify itself under these conditions can not be unworthy, and, indeed, many very worthy projects are rejected and delayed, if not entirely defeated, by these committees and Congress that the aggregate amount of Federal expenditures may be reduced.

The Army engineers made a detailed list and statement of such authorized projects as they could economically and profitably work upon during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and beside the name of each of such projects stated the amount of money that could be profitably expended in the improvement of each. The Army engineers also indicated by a cross each project that was new. This statement was submitted to the Budget Bureau, and I am pleased to submit it now to the Senate and ask that it be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. STANFIELD. The Budget Bureau, without rhyme or reason, without pointing to a single project that it deemed unworthy, without recommending that work be delayed upon a single project in this list, without recommending that the amount stated as required for any single project be reduced, and without giving a reason for reducing the aggregate amount required, as recommended by the Army engineers, arbitrarily and without justification cut the amount in two.

The subject came up in the Appropriations Committee of the House, and this committee, without pointing to a single project that was not justified or upon which the work could be delayed without doing great damage to the community served by such project, arbitrarily, and with the hope of satisfying the Representatives on the floor, increased the amount recommended by the Budget Bureau to $37,000,000.

The Members of the House who were familiar with the work proposed to be done by the Army engineers knew the importance of it and knew that every single project on the list was justified and immediate work was necessary to best serve the community and the country, increased the appropriation to the amount originally recommended by the Army engineers by a vote of 152 to 44.

It is not a secret that the railroad transportation of this country has failed miserably during the last few years to serve the producers. During the last harvest and within the last six months millions of bushels of choice apples produced in the Northwest have been dumped into the river for want of transportation, while the great mass of consumers in the East are compelled to pay 10 cents apiece for similar apples.

Seventy per cent of the population of the United States live east of the Mississippi River. Practically 50 per cent of the total population of the United States live in the 19 States adjoining and adjacent to the Atlantic Ocean, where they are readily and easily served by water transportation, and these people are to-day being penalized with exorbitant rents and exceptionally high building construction costs. Yet on the slope of the Pacific, in the three States of Washington, Oregon, and California, stands over one-half of all the saw timber in the United States.

The product of this timber can be transported by water to the Atlantic coast for from $12 to $15 per thousand feet less than it can be transported across the continent by rail, and this difference in transportation cost means from $20 to $30 per thousand feet difference in the price paid by the consumer.

A vessel that carries less than 3,000,000 feet can not afford to make the long trip from Pacific coast ports through the canal to Atlantic coast ports. Very few ports on the Pacific coast will admit vessels of this size, and these ports are not the shortest outlet for the vast timber resources. The expenditure of a very small sum of money will deepen and make secure several other ports which reach directly the mills and timber.

The ports on the Atlantic coast in the main are already improved and require maintenance only; the Panama Canal has been constructed at a great cost and has justified its undertaking. During the last year the largest tonnage passed through this canal of any year since its existence, and over $12,000,000 in tolls was collected, which is also the largest of any year. The coast to coast traffic, both east and west, was doubled during the last year. We have great fleets of vessels lying at anchor, deteriorating and rapidly approaching the worthless, useless stage—in fact, every link in the chain of water transportation between the Atlantic and Pacific is complete, barring the improvement of a few harbors—and if the appropriation for river and harbor work is reduced by Congress it means that many of these worthy, important, and justified harbor improvements on the Pacific coast will not be undertaken during the next fiscal year, for if the amount recommended by the engineers is reduced many projects will be eliminated for want of the money to start them, and no one at this time can tell what projects will be so eliminated.

It ill becomes the Budget Bureau and it ill becomes Congress or any Member of it to demand a reduction of the amount said to be necessary by the Army engineers, unless they can point their finger to some identical project or projects that are not justified and should be eliminated from the list as submitted.

The railroad interests of this country bitterly fought the construction of the Panama Canal. The railroad interests of this country have bitterly fought the elimination of tolls on coastwise trade through the canal. The railroad interests of this country have always opposed the improvement of rivers and harbors that would promote water transportation, and yet the railroads of this country have broken down and failed to properly serve either the producers or consumers during the last few years.

As an instance in my own State, in the great Hood River apple-producing section our people spent 10 years to grow orchards, and another year of spraying, cultivating, and pruning to produce a crop; then they picked it, wrapped it, and packed it, and hauled it to the warehouse, ready for shipment, only to find that the railroads would give them 10 cars where they needed 100. The warehouses became choked, filled to capacity, and still 50 per cent of the crop remained in the possession of the producers, without any facilities to protect it from the cold weather that was then fast approaching, the result of which was an enormous loss to these apple producers, and all for the want of sufficient refrigerator cars to ship it in.

During this strenuous period they were receiving less than ests oppose the development of rivers and harbors and the removal of the Panama Canal tolls on coastwise shipments, or any other thing that will move a pound of freight in any way except over the rails of the railroad; yet they are unable to properly serve the people and will be unable for some time to come.

Until it can be pointed out and proven that some item on the list submitted is not justified or the amount recommended by the Army engineers can not be economically and profitably expended during the coming fiscal year, I deem it my duty, with the responsibilities of serving my people and this country, to accept the recommendations made by the Army engineers and support the appropriation shown to be necessary.

Mr. President, we are legislating here daily to give relief to the industries of our country. To-day we had presented a bill to extend credit to agriculture. The question of credit to agriculture is of but little importance when compared with the interest and concern they have in the problem of transportation. The question of river and harbor development is not only of interest to the coasts, but it should be of concern to the entire country, because such improvements will tend to give better service to the interior part of the country if the traffic which comes from the coast is carried by way of the canal and out of our harbors and rivers.

BERTHA N. RICH.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that we proceed to the present consideration of Senate bill 4114, for the relief of Bertha N. Rich.

Mr. DIAL. Let the bill be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Assistant Secretary read the bill.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. In compliance with the suggestion of several Members of the Senate who think that $15,000 is too large in this case, I have consented to lower the amount, and I offer an amendment reducing the amount from $15,000 to $10,000. I understand that the Committee on Claims have established the precedent of making that the maximum in these claims, although this is a unique case, and had Mrs. Rich an opportunity to present the claim in court, undoubtedly she would receive a greater sum than this amount.

The death of the husband of the claimant was due to the gross negligence and carelessness of Army sergeants and privates who were in charge of a machine gun on exhibition at the Trenton State Fair, and I believe that the Government will only be doing justice to a very limited degree when the bill is passed appropriating $10,000 for the claim; but I understand the members of the committee believe that is sufficient, and therefore I offer the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill?

Mr. DIAL. I do not object to immediate consideration, but I want to speak on the merits of the bill.

I regret that the Senator waits until so late in the day to bring up important matters when there are so many Senators absent. I dislike, of course, to call for a quorum and I am not going to do so now, but I must say that I disapprove of the practice and possibly hereafter I shall insist upon the presence of a quorum. I would like very much for the Senate to be better posted with reference to such bills.

I have waited a long time, thinking that very probably a free and full investigation would be had of similar private claims, because I am convinced that the Government pays out a great deal of money which it should not pay. In this particular claim there is no liability whatever on the part of the Government as I see it. There is a full report by the department. The facts of the case were these: A fair association of Trenton requested the Government to send them an exhibit, and they sent this gun.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator to correct his statement?

Mr. DIAL. Very well.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The commander of the First Division made application to the fair for permission to send a recruiting squad there. The fair did not ask the First Division for the recruiting squad. The recruiting squad was sent there and no pay was exacted in any manner whatsoever. There was another exhibition known as a circus, a separate organization of the First Division, which they asked to come and which had no relation whatever to the recruiting end at all. They were separate things. For that they paid $2,000.

Mr. DIAL. I did not say anything about pay. I merely read the report casually and my recollection is that the fair association wanted the exhibit and it was sent there.

This was supposed to be an unloaded gun, but in some way or other a cartridge was placed in the gun. It was not to be fired, however. This was against instructions. The particular gun was installed in a 4-foot inclosure and no one was to get close to it. An Army officer or employee was in charge of it. The man in charge of it went to supper and left some one else in charge, and the deceased, the husband of the lady claimant, and some others were close to the gun. The deceased was pushed over against the gun and it exploded or was fired, and the man was killed. The Army officers investigated the case very thoroughly. My recollection is that according to the report they had three courts-martial and cleared every one of the Government employees.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. May I again correct the Senator?

Mr. DIAL. Certainly.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It is true that the charges were dismissed against the men, but the commanding general who ordered the men there on recruiting duty disapproved those charges. The destruction of this man's life was shown to have been due to gross negligence on the part of Army authorities. That is the report of the board convened by the Army authorities, that the gun was defective, that contrary to orders they had loaded ammunition, that the gun was fired in the face of spectators, and that the man was killed. It has been submitted to men who are lawyers and they say undoubtedly the Army was guilty of gross negligence.

Mr. DIAL. This demonstrates one of the misfortunes in waiting until so late in the day to bring up the bill. We get the facts confused. I do not desire to misrepresent the facts at all, but if anyone will read the report on page 3 he will see that the gun was not being fired under instructions of the Government. It was not to be fired at all. It was supposed to be a mum gun. I do not know what the Army calls it, but it was not to be fired and not intended to be exhibited in that way. The report said:

While standing here the gun was discharged and Mr. Rich fell to the ground. At the same instant Private Schwartz was pushed to a point near the gun by another man. As he struck the ground the gun fired.

It was not being fired by the officers, but the man was pushed against it and the gun went off—accidentally went off. So if anybody was liable, it was the fair company who invited the exhibit there, and not the United States Government. I have read the report, and I did not find where they convicted anybody. My recollection is they cleared everybody, showing it was not the fault of the Government, but was the fault of either the man who was a trespasser or the fault of some one else, or a pure accident. This kind of claim ought to go into court.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIAL. I decline to yield for the moment. I will yield presently.

The report shows that the Government relied upon the attorney for Mrs. Rich; that the attorney for Mrs. Rich prepared the case for the Government. That does not show a great deal of diligence on the part of the Government. Of course, I say nothing against the attorney, whose name, I believe, was Oliphant. He was very active in getting the case up and making out a case for Mrs. Rich, and the Government relied on what he said. It seems the case was looked into most thoroughly, and it was shown that the accident was not the Government's fault, and they discharged the men involved.

Of course, I know nothing about the people and never heard of them before. It is not a question with me of what Senator introduced the bill. That has no influence whatever with me. But I do not think the Government is ready to donate money to people who bring about their own injury or are injured purely accidentally. Certainly the Government is not liable. The fair association might be liable or the man who pushed the deceased against the gun might be liable, but there is no ground here to show that the Government was liable, and there is no reason why money should be paid to these people, unless we want the Government to go into the business of contributing to the people of New Jersey.

Mr. President, I want Senators to know what they are voting on. In the first place, the Government is not at all liable, as I see it. In the next place, the case ought to be tried in the court. If the Government is willing to give its consent, I have no objection to that course at all. I think we are going to have to establish the precedent here sooner or later that such matters must be tried in court.

The next remedy is, if we are going to give anything at all, whether we want to donate the magnificent sum of $25,000, as was provided when the matter first came here, though it is proposed now to cut it down to $15,000, and I understand there will be a proposition submitted to reduce it to $10,000.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 4114) for the relief of Bertha N. Rich, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, in line 6, to strike out "$25,000" and insert "$15,000," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $15,000 to Bertha N. Rich, now residing in Trenton, in the county of Mercer, N. J., as full compensation for the loss of life of her late husband, Walter A. Rich, who was killed by the accidental discharge of a machine gun at the Interstate Fair at Trenton, N. J., October 2, 1920.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I move to amend by reducing the amount to $5,000. However, I presume I can not do that before we dispose of the amendment to the amendment of the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The first question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. ROBINSON. The proper parliamentary procedure would be for the Senator from South Carolina to offer his amendment to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I am a member of the committee, and mine may be regarded as a modification of the committee amendment. However, I will temporarily withdraw my amendment in order that the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina may be voted on.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator need not do that. The amendment is in order as an amendment to the amendment of the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. An amendment to strike out and insert is in order.

Mr. DIAL. Then my motion is to strike out "$10,000" and insert "$5,000."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. In lieu of the sum proposed to be inserted by the committee insert "$5,000."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. It is now proposed by the Senator from New Jersey, in lieu of the sum proposed to be inserted by the committee, "$15,000," to insert "$10,000."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened; and (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate, under the order previously made, took a recess until to-morrow, Friday, January 26, 1923, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 25, 1923.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. Earle Wilfey, D. D., pastor of the Vermont Avenue Christian Church, offered the following prayer:

O God, our Father in heaven, we await the inspiration of Thy spirit and the touch of Thy guiding hand. This day will not be what it ought to be without a sense of Thy presence, and we pray that Thy illuminating spirit may fill the hearts and minds this day that as men chosen for a great task we shall have a sense of the power of God in discharging it. We pray, Heavenly Father, that the men here assembled, representing as they do a great free people, may feel not only the weight of responsibility but a pride in something worth doing. And we pray that Thou wilt guide them this day and give them that measure of success in high doing that shall be Thine.

Our thoughts this morning, dear Father, are tempered by a great sorrow that has overtaken the Chaplain of this House, and we pray in the mercy of Thy love that Thou wilt deal gently and kindly with Doctor Montgomery and his family in their great bereavement. Thou who dost temper the wind to the shorn lamb be kind to them in this dark hour. Now we commit ourselves to Thee and ask that Thou wilt do for us what we can not do for ourselves, and that in all things we may be true and have Thy blessings upon our efforts. Hear us this morning at the beginning of this day's work and lead us at last to the light of truth and deeds of honor. We ask it for Thy great name's sake. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

INTERNAL-REVENUE COLLECTION DISTRICTS.

Mr. MILLS, from the Committee on Ways and Means, by direction of that committee, submitted a report (No. 1451) to accompany S. 2051, to amend section 3142 of the Revised Statutes to permit an increase in the number of collection districts for the collection of internal revenue and in the number of collectors of internal revenue from 64 to 65, which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

HAWAIIAN HOMES COMMISSION.

Mr. CURRY. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Territories I call up the bill (S. 4309) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii,' approved April 30, 1900, as amended, to establish an Hawaiian homes commission, granting certain powers to the board of harbor commissioners of the Territory of Hawaii, and for other purposes," approved July 9, 1921, a similar House bill, H. R. 13631, being on the calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California calls up the bill S. 4309, a similar bill being on the House Calendar. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That paragraph (a) of section 207 of an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii,' approved April 30, 1900, as amended, to establish an Hawaiian homes commission, granting certain powers to the board of harbor commissioners of the Territory of Hawaii, and for other purposes," approved July 9, 1921, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"(a) The commission is authorized to leave to native Hawaiians the right to the use and occupancy of a tract of Hawaiian home lands within the following acreage limits:

"(1) Not less than 20 nor more than 80 acres of agricultural lands; or

"(2) Not less than 100 nor more than 500 acres of first-class pastoral lands; or

"(3) Not less than 250 nor more than 1,000 acres of second-class pastoral lands: Provided, however, That lots, each of one-half of an acre or more, of any class of land may be leased as residence lots."

SEC. 2. That section 213 of the said act is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 213. There is hereby established in the treasury of the Territory a revolving fund to be known as the 'Hawaiian Home Loan Fund.' The entire receipts derived from any leasing of the 'available lands' defined in section 203, these receipts including proportionate shares of the receipts from the lands of Huamula Mauka, Piihonua, and Kaohi Makuu, of which lands portions are yet to be selected, and 80 per cent of the Territorial receipts derived from the leasing of cultivated sugarcane lands under any other provision of law, or from water licenses, shall be covered into the fund until the amount of money paid therein from those three sources alone shall equal $1,000,000. In addition to these moneys and the moneys covered into the revolving fund as installments paid by lessees upon loans made to them as provided in paragraph 2 of section 215, there shall be covered into the revolving fund all other moneys received by the commission from any source whatsoever."

SEC. 3. That paragraph (1) of section 215 of the said act is hereby amended to read as follows:

"(1) The amount of loans to any one borrower outstanding at any one time shall not exceed $3,000: Provided, however, That the amount of loans outstanding at any one time to the holder of a residence lot shall not exceed $1,000."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, as this is a bill that has not been considered in the House, I think some explanation ought to be made to the House so that we may know the character of the legislation.

Mr. CURRY. Mr. Speaker, this bill corrects the reference to a section in the old bill which was misnumbered. It provides for resident lots within the land allotment set aside for the Hawaiian rehabilitation of lots of half an acre or more for residential lots. Under the act at present on the statute book there is no provision for resident lots. There will be probably 100 or 200 Hawaiians who are working at Hilo and vicinity who wish to have a home on resident lots. It cuts the loan down to $1,000 on a resident lot.

Mr. STAFFORD. I thought it was $3,000.

Mr. CURRY. One thousand dollars on the resident lot and $3,000 for the other. There are two experiment stations of 5 acres each, and on each of them they grow garden truck; they have about 1,000 chickens, some hogs, and cattle; and under the ruling of the attorney general of the Territory of Hawaii the receipts from the sale of the products of the chickens and the hogs and the gardens go into the treasury of the Territory instead of into the revolving fund.

Mr. STAFFORD. This is for the benefit of the native Hawaiians, to encourage them in building home dwellings?

Mr. CURRY. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. To what extent have they availed themselves of it in the past?

Mr. CURRY. Less than 100 so far, but they expect soon to have 500 or 600 on the land.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question with relation to Hawaii?

Mr. CURRY. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman tell us why it is that the Territory is not entitled to the privileges under the good roads act and the Sheppard-Towner maternity bill? That question has been asked me and I was unable to answer.

Mr. CURRY. It is because they do not apply to the Territory.

Mr. SNELL. Was it not the intention that they should apply to the Territory?

Mr. CURRY. I have tried for some time to have these acts apply to the Territories, but I am informed that the Territories receive more money under existing law than they would if the acts applied to the Territory. In Alaska 99.3 per cent of the land belongs to the United States Government. In Hawaii all of the public land belongs to the Territory of Hawaii. When Hawaii came into the Union they reserved, as Texas reserved when she came in, all of her public lands. We have no authority over the public lands; and so far as the road building is concerned through that Territory, I believe the Territory of Hawaii receives more money than if the law applied to that Territory.

Mr. SNELL. A prominent citizen of that Territory asked me that question a short time ago, and said there was a movement on foot in Hawaii to see if they could not come in under that law, that they felt there were advantages that should come to them on account of the law, and they believed that they are not receiving as many benefits as they would if they were allowed to avail themselves of the good roads act.

Mr. CURRY. The proper thing for them to do is to introduce bills and have one referred to the Committee on Roads and the other to the Committee on Education, and have those committees consider the bills.

Mr. SNELL. What would they lose if they did come in under that act?

Mr. CURRY. I do not know what they would gain.

Mr. SNELL. Would they not get some of the appropriation?

Mr. CURRY. Probably, but with the result that the Committee on Appropriations would more than likely cut down proportionately what they are getting now through other sources.

Mr. SNELL. Could the gentleman put into the Record what they are getting that applies directly to good roads? Is that a matter that is obtainable?

Mr. CURRY. I think I can get that information.

Mr. SNELL. I wish the gentleman would put it into the Record. I would like to give this gentleman that information. He is a personal friend of mine, and I could not answer his question.

Mr. CURRY. If you will ask the Delegate from Hawaii I think he can tell you right now.

Mr. SNELL. I would be very glad to have that information.

Mr. CURRY. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. CURRY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

A similar House bill (H. R. 13631) was laid on the table.

On No. 6: Strikes out the language proposed by the House reappropriating the unexpended balance of 1923 for the air mail service.

On No. 8: Appropriates for the payment of limited indemnity for the loss or injury of international mail in the language proposed by the Senate instead of the language proposed by the House.

On No. 9: Appropriates $1,222,000 instead of $1,522,000, as proposed by the Senate, and $1,122,000, as proposed by the House, for miscellaneous equipment and supplies.

On No. 10: Retains the language inserted by the Senate, but reduces the amount to be expended for furniture and equipment for post-office quarters from $500,000 to $200,000.

On No. 11: Appropriates $14,500,000, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $15,000,000, as proposed by the House, for vehicle allowance.

The committee of conference have not agreed upon the following amendments of the Senate:

On No. 7: Relating to the carrying of foreign mail on American steamships.

On No. 12: Extending the Joint Postal Commission.

On No. 13: Corrects section number.

C. B. SLEMP,
CHAS. F. OGDEN,
MARTIN B. MADDEN,
EDWARD T. TAYLOR,

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, as this bill passed the Senate it carried $585,222,991.50. As the bill was passed by the House it carried $584,614,191.50, the Senate having added $608,800. In the conference the House recedes from $258,800 and the Senate recedes from $350,000, so that the bill for 1924 as agreed on carries $584,872,991.50, an increase over the appropriations of 1923 of $20,698,425. The estimates for 1924 were $590,166,191.50, and the appropriations for 1924 are $584,872,991.50, a decrease under the estimate amounting to $5,293,200, and an increase over what the House passed of $258,800.

If no one wishes to ask any questions about this, I move the adoption of the conference report.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first item in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 7: Page 15, line 15, after the word "states," insert: "Provided further, That no contract or contracts for carrying mails on foreign steamships shall be made when such mail can be carried on American steamships at a reasonable price."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House further insist upon its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 7.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 12: Page 21, after line 3, insert:
"Sec. 2. That the joint commission authorized under section 6 of the act approved April 24, 1920, entitled 'An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes,' is hereby continued until June 30, 1924, to complete the investigation and to prepare a detailed report containing a summary of its findings thereof, and such recommendations as to legislation as it may deem proper: Provided, That said commission shall not expend a greater sum than $75,000 during the fiscal year 1924."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House further insist upon its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 12.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to make a preferential motion. I move that the House recede and concur in the amendment.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I hope that the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota will not prevail. In the first place, the commission was created for the fiscal year 1920. It was understood at that time that the work of the commission would not last more than one year, and during the consideration of the Post Office appropriation bill last year the Senate conferees thought that they would like to have the life of the commission continued for one more year. The House conferees came back with the recommendation that that be done, and it was clearly understood by the conferees of the House that the life of the commission would not be extended over the period ending June 30, 1923.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Is it not the history of all of these little innocent annual commissions that are created that they lap over and over eternally and that you can not get rid of them?

Mr. MADDEN. We are now trying to get rid of this one.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Who are the present members of the commission?

Mr. MADDEN. They are members of the Post Office Committees of the Senate and of the House. Ten of them are members of those two committees, except one is appointed from the Post Office Department.

Mr. STEENERSON. The chairman and four members of each committee and one appointed by the Post Office Department, making 11 in all.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Do they hold their membership by reason of their membership on those committees or as individuals?

Mr. MADDEN. The law distinctly provides that no person can be a member of the commission except he be a member of the Committee on the Post Office of either House, and one from the Post Office Department.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. And they do not get any compensation?

Mr. MADDEN. They do not.

Mr. ROUSE. And the law also provided that the Postmaster General shall appoint one.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; one.

Mr. ROUSE. And he has appointed the chief post office inspector?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. The inference might well be drawn from the question asked by the gentleman from Texas that this is a salaried commission.

Mr. MADDEN. It is not.

Mr. BLANTON. But we are providing $75,000 for 1924 in this amendment, if we agree to it, whether it is a salaried commission or not.

Mr. RAMSEYER. This commission looks after a business of $600,000,000, the business of the Post Office Department.

Mr. MADDEN. No; they are not. The Post Office Department looks after that business.

Mr. RAMSEYER. They are the board of directors, as Postmaster General Hays once expressed it.

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, no; they are not. They were not appointed for that purpose.

Mr. RAMSEYER. In amendment No. 4 you provide for an appropriation of $500,000—

Mr. MADDEN. That has already been adopted.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I am simply laying the foundation for another question, if the gentleman will be patient—$500,000 to carry on the investigation to ascertain the cost of carrying the different classes of mail. At present is not that investigation really being conducted by this Joint Postal Commission?

Mr. MADDEN. It is not. It is being conducted by the Post Office Department, if any investigation is being conducted, and I do not think any is being conducted at the present time.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Then you have an appropriation of $500,000, and if I am correctly informed, the Post Office Department started with this investigation at the instance and under the direction of this postal commission. Now, if the Joint Postal Commission is abolished, why you in fact abolish the directing head to continue this investigation?

Mr. MADDEN. The Postmaster General is responsible for any investigation which may be made by the Post Office Department, and we are simply giving $500,000 for auxiliary clerks for the men who are particularly fit to make the investigation. It is not under anybody's direction except the Postmaster General's direction.

Mr. ROUSE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I will.

Mr. ROUSE. I happen to be a member of the Joint Postal Commission. This $500,000 is supposed to be used by the Post Office officials—

Mr. MADDEN. By the department?

Mr. ROUSE. The Post Office Department has connected with it the only people who are qualified to make this investigation. The Post Office Committee of the House has recommended this legislation. The postal commission wants the appropriation. The postal commission can not do the work because nobody on the commission is qualified to do it.

Mr. MADDEN. It is done by clerks of the Post Office Department.

Mr. ROUSE. Yes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Was not this investigation started at the instance and request of this joint commission?

Mr. ROUSE. No; it was really started by the publishers, who wanted this investigation made in order to show whether or not they were paying too much for handling second-class mail. The publishers are now opposed to this investigation, and it ought to proceed, and it should be done by the officials of the Post Office Department, who are the only qualified ones to do this work.

Mr. MADDEN. That is all this appropriation contemplates.

Mr. ROUSE. This Postal Commission was created in 1920. They have spent since that time over $230,000 up to the middle of last December. The first act creating this commission gave the commission the right to spend money from the unexpended balance of the Post Office Department, and that was unlimited. The next Post Office appropriation bill enacted provided that the expenditure should not exceed $150,000. This amendment asks for $75,000. The Post Office Commission started out, in my opinion, and it is my opinion to this day, to reestablish those obsolete, worn-out pneumatic tubes. That work has been completed and we have an appropriation in the bill to continue the tubes. The Postal Commission can do no work, in my opinion, that will be beneficial to the Post Office Department, and if you will inquire of the Post Office Department, I believe the Postmaster General will tell you he is opposed to the continuation of this commission. You will only do this: You will spend about $75,000 on junketing trips for employees and avail nothing. The commission ought not to have been born; as it is, it should be killed at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. MADDEN. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] and reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, it is very easy to create prejudice against commissions by loose and unwarranted statements. This commission, it is true, was created in 1920, and their order was to investigate the present and prospective methods and systems of handling, dispatching, transporting, and delivering mails, and the facilities therefor, and especially methods and systems which relate to the handling and dispatch of the mails in the large cities of the United States. Now, there is no existing understanding as to how long this commission should continue. There never was. There are people here who get up and talk every time a bill comes up that we have an understanding contemporaneous with the act. It must be taken with a great deal of doubt. There was no understanding at any time. It was an annual appropriation bill. Of course, appropriations are made for that year, for work for that year, and that is the work required to be performed. I want to call attention to the fact that there was a revolutionary change and transformation of the Postal Service when we inaugurated the parcel post. The parcel post the first year that it was inaugurated amounted to a billion. It is now from five to six billion.

It constitutes two-thirds of all the volume of mail which we handle. We were not equipped for a freight and package business. The post office was not for that purpose, and the trains were not equipped for it, and the clerks were not equipped for it, and so there was a congestion everywhere. I talked with former Postmaster General Burleson at considerable length when this proposition was made, and he realized that there ought to be a study made of the situation in regard to the transportation, handling, and disposition of mails in the large cities, and especially because of this transformation of the work of the Postal Department. So he proposed this commission. The commission was authorized to employ engineers and postal experts, and they were authorized to call upon the department to furnish whatever help they could. The commission works without pay, which is extra work. The members of the commission have employed experts at great cost. We employed, for instance, W. B. Richards & Co., one of the greatest engineering firms in the United States, and they had their experts investigate conditions in the large cities; for instance, as to where they were equipped to handle this matter. The Post Office Department is located in Washington, and it is true that we have got efficient men; but in order to understand the situation you have got to be on the spot where these congested centers are and have investigation made by engineers of experience in business and traffic and transportation problems. These engineers had been employed by and investigated such corporations as the Steel Trust and the General Electric Co. They reported that we were employing thousands of clerks, drawing salaries of $1,400 to $1,800 per year, to handle parcels and package freight which could be more efficiently done by common labor at much less cost; consequently, they recommended that instead of detaching clerks, the Post Office Department should employ laborers to do this work, and this has been very largely done, resulting in saving of hundreds of thousands of dollars annually.

They also investigated the condition of the motor-vehicle service in the large cities, which costs $15,000,000 a year to operate, and they recommended changes which have resulted in improved efficiency and economy, thus saving the Government large sums. The question of centralization of the dispatch of mail in New York, Chicago, Boston, and other large cities—changes were suggested that have been adopted by the department with good results.

There had been a proposition urged upon Congress for years to build a tunnel under the city of New York which would cost $1,500,000, but the engineers said it would be absolutely useless, and they turned that project down. There were a great many other propositions that were brought before the commission and which are now before the commission. We investigated the building conditions in nearly all the large cities and made recommendations both for legislation and administration. We have made 28 reports to Congress. I have them here on my desk. The engineers and postal experts investigated the cities of New York, Brooklyn, Boston, Buffalo, Pittsburgh, Detroit, Baltimore, and Philadelphia. They made recommendations on pneumatic tubes in New York, Chicago, and Boston, and in the method of conducting the money-order business and other administrative features of the post office. They suggested changes that are saving the country millions of dollars. One of the recommendations they made, as stated by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROUSE], was that there should be an ascertainment of the cost of handling the different classes of mail.

Mr. ROUSE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. In a minute. The engineers recommended that, and the commission advocated it and passed a unanimous resolution, as I recall, unless the gentleman from Kentucky voted against it. He might have.

Mr. ROUSE. I voted for it.

Mr. STEENERSON. The gentleman says he voted for it. We passed a unanimous resolution to carry on that investigation. That was months ago. We detailed the W. B. Richards Co. to investigate that. They spent weeks and months in collaboration with the Post Office Department officials devising forms of questionnaires and instructions to be sent out to the clerks and post offices throughout the country, and we have printed millions of these forms and questionnaires to be sent out to be used in this work.

Everybody who has ever studied the American system of government will know and realize that one of the great evils and weaknesses here is that all these branches of the public service are self-inspected. The War Department inspects itself and approves of whatever it does. So do other departments. Here we have an efficient engineering firm representing the joint commission, representing the legislative department, working in collaboration with the Post Office Department. The Post Office Department originated the idea; Mr. Burleson originated it; and it has worked finely; and the reason why the Post Office Department to-day is approaching a self-sustaining condition is by reason of the reforms inaugurated and suggested by the joint commission.

The investigation of the cost of handling this mail is opposed only by those who do not want to be investigated.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. The periodical publications, which have been enjoying a bonus or a subsidy from the Government for years and years, first said they wanted to have this investigation made, but as soon as the commission recommended it they turned around, and they and their organs have attacked the commission from one end of the country to the other. [Applause.] We are being abused by the representatives of the big journals that are reaping a benefit and a bonus at the expense of the Postal Service because we are trying to find out what the truth is about the different classes of mail.

Now, this is all throwing sand in the eyes of the Members of this House and in the eyes of the public to say that it was understood that this commission was to be discontinued. The work laid out there by Mr. Burleson is such as to require years to perform, necessarily, and it is of benefit to the public and to the Government and to the taxpayers of the United States; and you can not properly carry on this work of investigating the cost of handling the mail, for which you appropriated $500,000, without the aid of the commission and their efficient experts.

Now, when you get that work done what is it to be. It is to be something that can be accepted as proof of the truth? If so, it ought to be promulgated not only with the sanction of the department interested but also with the sanction of both Houses of Congress. It has that sanction when it has the sanction of the joint commission, and it should continue until the work is completed in a final report. It will then bear more credence and be taken as positive proof of the statements therein that the cost of this thing is so much and the cost of this other thing so much, whereas if we leave it to the department alone and throw the responsibility upon it what will be the answer? The same as it was before. Why, it will be that "the department is prejudiced, that they are not fair; we can not take that; we dispute the department." They have done that in the past; all these periodicals that are clamoring for a lower rate have done that.

Mr. ROUSE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. ROUSE. The gentleman, of course, understands that the House has appropriated $500,000 for that work?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes. We will have our representatives collaborating with them.

Mr. ROUSE. These high-priced engineers have not had anything to do with that.

Mr. STEENERSON. The gentleman does not know. We have 10 other members of the commission, and they are unanimous.

Mr. ROUSE. I have not taken all these junketing trips that the gentleman referred to.

Mr. STEENERSON. The gentleman had better.

Mr. ROUSE. Is the Postmaster General in favor of the continuance of this commission?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes; he is in favor of it, and anybody who has looked into it is in favor of it, because it will aid this Government in establishing and maintaining an efficient Postal Service.

Take the service as it is to-day. Your parcels post is scattered all over the sidewalk. Your commission has made a study of the proposition of moving the parcels post by gravity, so that you will not have to have it lugged up on the backs of clerks. There is a great deal of opportunity for improvement in a business so big as the Postal Service. We surely can not lose anything by continuing this commission for six months longer in order that it may finish the investigation. Many of us have spent days down there in the department in consultation with the men who are going to carry on the investigation in the department. There is nothing in this except that we are striving to reach a knowledge of the business and to determine these things in accordance with the facts. I am sorry that the conferees have taken the attitude that they have, because it is positively against the best interests of the people and the taxpayers. There is nothing here that can be criticized.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROUSE] talks about "junketing." What pleasure is there in going down into the basement of those buildings in the city of New York, for instance, and seeing the workshops of some of those employees? You would be ashamed of yourselves if you inspected, as I have, the postal situation in New York and in some of the larger cities, Boston included, in some of the stations where they have not the facilities to work, they are crowded, and ill ventilated. They have not the proper toilet facilities. They have the poorest working conditions of any people in this country in some places, and still you do not want us to find it out and remedy them. You want Uncle Sam to provide working quarters that are unfit for use for his servants, many of whom are poorly paid. We have discovered this. I have, on behalf of this commission, visited more than 20 stations in the city of New York and many substations in Boston and elsewhere, and I tell you that we have found out more about this business of carrying on the mail service than we ever knew before, and you would never find it out by sitting here in your seats. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. STEENERSON. If I could have a little more time I would be glad to answer questions.

Mr. MADDEN. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PAIGE].

Mr. PAIGE. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I think the House ought to understand what is at the bottom of this whole proposition. For years it has been a disputed question whether the Government was losing $60,000,000 or $70,000,000 a year in carrying the second-class mail. The Postal Commission has been investigating that question. The second-class publishers claim there is no loss. The Government claims there is a loss of $60,000,000 or $70,000,000 a year. The Joint Postal Commission is undertaking to find out whether there is a loss or not. There never has been such a propaganda put up against anything as there has been against this proposition about second-class mail.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAIGE. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. I tried to get the gentleman from Minnesota to yield to me, but he would not do it. The gentleman talks as if there was no provision made in this bill for the investigation of the cost of carrying the mail, but there is an appropriation of $500,000 in the bill, and it is going to be expended by the Postmaster General to ascertain the very fact that the gentleman says the commission is ascertaining, and the commission has nothing to do with it.

Mr. PAIGE. Mr. Speaker, let us see who constitute the Joint Postal Commission. In the Senate are Senator TOWNSEND and Senator STERLING—

Mr. MADDEN. Senator TOWNSEND will not be there after the 4th of March.

Mr. PAIGE. Senator WALSH of Massachusetts and Senator MCKELLER, of Tennessee, and four Members of the House. All these Members are in favor of extending this commission and expending the $75,000. There have been expended already over $200,000, and to stop it now would be to waste all that has been spent in the past. It is simply a question whether or not the Government wants to have this investigation made as to the cost of second-class mail. The publishers of second-class mail matter have tried to impress upon the Post Office Department that there is no loss. I asked Mr. Stewart, of the Post Office Department, if he thought there was a loss of $60,000,000 a year, and he said not less than that. Now, that is the question to be determined. If the publishers of second-class mail matter believed what they claim, that they want to know the actual cost, they would not put any hindrance in the way of ascertaining this fact, but I know they are trying to hinder it by protesting against this $75,000 proposition.

The whole thing in a nutshell is whether Congress wants to appropriate $75,000 more to ascertain whether we are losing that amount of money in carrying the second-class mail or whether the second-class mail men are going to check this thing at this time and impress on the Post Office Department what they claim—that there is no loss. That is the whole thing in a nutshell, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I am very sorry to have these gentlemen, who are members of the commission, make the statements they have made, because I know we do not wish to misconstrue the facts; and if the House believe the statements literally, they will be deceived. These gentlemen try to make you understand that no provision is being made in this bill for the ascertainment of the cost of handling the mail, and they further try to make you understand that the joint commission that we are seeking to abolish is going to make that ascertainment. The joint commission is not going to make the ascertainment, and the ascertainment is going to be made. Who is going to make it? Why, the Postmaster General; and we have provided $500,000 in this bill to enable him to do it.

Mr. STEENERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Not now. The gentleman would not yield to me.

Mr. STEENERSON. The gentleman controls the time, and I wanted to make my speech.

Mr. MADDEN. We are providing for the ascertainment of the cost. I do not know anything about what the publishers want. They may not want the ascertainment of the cost. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PAIGE] and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] may be correct about that. But whether they want it or not, it is not going to make any difference. They are going to get it. This bill provides that the ascertainment shall be made. These gentlemen on the joint commission will try to make you believe it is not going to be made. I give you my word that it is going to be made and that we have provided the money to make it. The money is carried in this bill. Who is going to make the ascertainment? Why, the law, as carried in this appropriation bill, provides that the auxiliary clerks of the Post Office Department shall be assigned to the duty under the direction of the Postmaster General to ascertain the facts. That does not mean that the Postal Commission, if continued, will have anything whatever to do with it. They will not have anything to do with it. So, whether you continue the commission or not, the commission will have absolutely nothing whatever to do with the ascertainment of this cost.

Mr. STEENERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. No.

Mr. STEENERSON. I deny that statement.

Mr. MADDEN. Well, but the law is clear. The appropriation bill provides $9,000,000 for auxiliary clerks.

Mr. ROUSE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. In just a moment. The bill sets aside $500,000 out of that $9,000,000 to employ clerks especially to make this ascertainment of cost. Now, this $500,000 is not under the jurisdiction of the commission, even if the commission should be continued. The commission would have no jurisdiction whatever over it. Now, all the purpose of continuing this commission is that there may be a lot of clerks kept who are now on the pay roll who ought not to be there and who ought not to be kept, and the commission ought to be abolished.

Mr. ROUSE. I want to say to the membership of the House that Mr. Joseph Stewart, who was Second Assistant Postmaster General under Mr. Taft, and the best qualified man in the department or in the country to-day to make this ascertainment, has been put at the head of this work in the Post Office Department.

Mr. PAIGE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. PAIGE. Is it not a fact that the commission is co-operating with the Post Office Department to bring out these facts, and is it not a fact that some of the ablest Senators at the other end of the Capitol are asking for this?

Mr. MADDEN. They are. Senators are always asking for appropriations.

Mr. PAIGE. Because they believe this is the only way in which these facts can be ascertained.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman knows that the appropriation has already been provided.

Mr. PAIGE. There is not anything of the kind.

Mr. MADDEN. It is already in the bill. It is not for the commission. The commission would have nothing to do with it.

I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, this is the third occasion when the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads has come before Congress asking for the continuance for another year so as to complete the work of this commission. It was originally authorized in April, 1920, with the specific provision that the work should be completed March 1, 1921. The Post Office Committee came before Congress the next year in the Post Office appropriation bill and asked for $150,000 additional appropriation to complete the work before June 30, 1922. Last year they again came before Congress giving assurance that if we would give them $125,000 more they would complete the work by June 30 of the present fiscal year. Now they come before Congress again with the same old story and ask for an additional appropriation to complete the work by the end of the next fiscal year.

Let us get down to the facts. They have six months more in which to complete the work. They have been promising year after year that the work would be completed at the end of the next fiscal year. They want to postpone it now to June 30, 1924. Congress will be adjourned at that time for the presidential election. What we should do is to call the commission to time, force them to make their report by June 30, 1923, so that when Congress assembles at the next regular session it will be able to use this information.

This is not the first time that we have had special commissions appointed to investigate conditions in the Post Office Department. Away back 16 years ago they appointed a commission to make a report, and as a member of a subcommittee to specially consider the report I studied it carefully, but little good in the way of legislation came as a result of that commission's findings. Now, we find this commission with expenditures running up into the thousands and thousands of dollars for expenses, visiting New York, and the like, asking for $75,000 more.

Last year I asked definitely whether the work would be completed on June 30 of this year if $125,000 more was granted, and I received the assurance that they would finish it by June 30 of this year. Now, the commissioners, like so many of us, find it difficult to separate themselves from the public teat, but ask that it be continued for another year.

Mr. LINTHICUM. How much have they expended?

Mr. STAFFORD. Under the first appropriation they had unlimited funds. On June 30, 1922, we gave them $150,000 to complete the work, and last year we voted $125,000 for expenses during the present fiscal year. The wording in that appropriation was to complete the investigation and prepare a detailed report.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Does the department want this continued?

Mr. STAFFORD. I have had assurances that the department does not, but there is a dispute as to that, and I am not in the confidence of the department.

Mr. PAIGE. What does the gentleman consider to be the duties of the Joint Postal Commission?

Mr. STAFFORD. It is set forth in the law "to investigate the present methods of handling, transporting, and dispatching and delivering the mails." They have had three years or more from April, 1920, to do the work, and every year they come before Congress and ask to continue the appropriations for another year. I say let us call time and get the report. They have still six months in which to complete their report, and if we do not vote any more money they will get busy and make their report to Congress, and Congress at the next session will have the data available on which to act.

Mr. STEENERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. STEENERSON. Why does the gentleman make the statement that the commission has made no report, when I hold in my hand 28 pages recommending administrative changes?

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman deny what I have said? Each year it has carried this language to complete the investigation and prepare a detailed report. I am opposed to giving this commission any more money to continue this performance.

Mr. BRIGGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. For a question.

Mr. BRIGGS. Why has not the commission completed the report before this? What is the reason? I see that they have made some tentative report.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman will have to ask some member of the commission. The vice chairman of the commission says that they have made a preliminary report. They have gone over the field, and they have gone over it sufficiently so that they should now apply themselves to digesting the material on hand. If the commission should say to the engineers get busy, because Congress is not going to continue the appropriation and we want you to make the report by June 30 of this year, they would get busy, and if they did not I would say dismiss them on the spur of the moment.

Mr. BRIGGS. Why can not it be done? What reason does the commission give?

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, they say the work is so voluminous that it is necessary to run over to New York and other places and make investigations, and that they must have more time to investigate fully and make a report.

Mr. PAIGE. If the gentleman will yield, I do not believe the membership of the House understand anything about the magnitude of the duties of the postal commission. The Post Office Department has been growing by leaps and bounds, year after year, and no one knows the cost of handling the different classes of mail.

Mr. STAFFORD. I shall have to decline to yield for a speech.

Mr. PAIGE. Any man that claims that the postal commission has not done what it was appointed to do and has not been diligent does not know what he is talking about.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is a nice, gratuitous fling by a member of the commission who has been taking trips about the country. Perhaps I do not know as much as the gentleman does, but I know this much from my service on the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads for eight years, that it does not require any high-priced engineers on the pay roll for four years to make a report as to the cost of these services. There is plenty of that kind of information down in the department to-day. Under Second Assistant Postmaster General Stewart, 12 years ago, all that information was acquired, and there is no better authority than former Second Assistant Postmaster General Stewart. All that data is at the department, and I say from my acquaintance with this work that six months is adequate to complete the work. Price, Waterhouse & Co., and other leading accounting firms, would not require a lifetime to do the work of this character.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. The gentleman made the statement that the Post Office Department had the information to give us. The Post Office Department can not give you any information as to the cost of anything they are handling.

Mr. STAFFORD. They have the data down there, because Mr. Stewart years back, when we created the postal parcel-post system, made an investigation.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Oh, that was long before the parcel post was inaugurated.

Mr. STAFFORD. Not more than 12 years ago, and the gentleman knows that this is only for the purpose of continuing some high-priced fellows in the service for another year.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Oh, I am not interested in that at all.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it not good business policy to call them and say that they must complete that work in six months?

Mr. RAMSEYER. I do know that this commission started this investigation, and if it had not been for the work of the commission they would never have started it.

Mr. PAIGE. There are no high-priced men there at all now.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Cut down the appropriation if you want to.

Mr. STAFFORD. I want the work completed, and if they needed $50,000 with which to complete the work this year I would vote it; but this idea of extending the time each year for a full year should be brought to a close.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Cut down the appropriation for the commission, but let the commission go on.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, if the Members of the House will examine the five pages of itemized expenses of this commission that my colleague [Mr. Rouse] placed in the Record on the 13th day of last May, they will see where the position of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] is correct, and that the life of this commission should cease. The very purpose for which it was created—the accumulation of data in respect to the expense of handling different classes of mail—is in the Post Office Department now. The Postmaster General, Mr. Bursleson, gave us plenty of light on that subject when there was an effort to abolish the zone system a few years ago, and also when there was an effort on behalf of some to make some of the big publishers pay more of what they should justly pay for the handling of their publications. We had all of that data before us then. We knew then and we know now that it is costing the Government to handle merely the publications of the Curtis Publishing Co. alone approximately $1,000,000 more than we take in for handling them. We already have the data before us. Look at this—the items of expense—and you will see where the money has gone, the $234,000 that this commission has expended already—junketing trips to New York. Look at the New York trips and the hotel bills, month by month, for the highly paid secretary of this commission and others in its employ.

Our friend from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] says that this commission saved hundreds of thousands of dollars by employing high-priced engineers—to determine what? To determine that you could use ordinary labor to handle freight more cheaply than you could a high-salaried clerk. Do you need high-priced engineers to reach that determination? That is something that should be apparent upon its face to a business man. It should prove itself by merely asserting the proposition. It needs no high-priced investigation by high-priced engineers to reach a determination of that kind.

Mr. PAIGE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. PAIGE. Does the gentleman know that there is no high-priced engineer employed at the present time and there has not been for over a year?

Mr. BLANTON. I am only repeating what the gentleman's chairman said.

Mr. PAIGE. I do not care what he said.

Mr. BLANTON. Get his remarks, and the gentleman will see that I am just repeating his language. Why, he named the high-priced engineers that he employed, he gave the name of the firm, and he said that they had brought about this great saving.

Mr. PAIGE. Oh, that was two or three years ago, not at the present time.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, yes; but under the provisions of the act that created this commission it should have died on March 1, 1921, but it was extended over for another year, and another $150,000 was given to it. Again it should have ceased to exist in 1922, yet it was extended on, and now here is an effort to give it $75,000 more for 1924, when the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has correctly stated that you have already authorized in this bill $500,000 for just such investigating purposes, and I want to say right now, I do not care who is Postmaster General, the Postmaster General can find out more about these propositions at less expense than any commission of the kind that was ever created.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question. The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The vote comes first upon the motion made by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] to recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. STEENERSON) there were—ayes 21, noes 77.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present, and I object to the vote because there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. It is clear that there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will bring in absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 90, nays 212, answered "present" 1, not voting 125, as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:
Page 21, line 11, strike out the figure "2" and insert in lieu thereof the figure "3."
Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move to further insist on the disagreement.
The motion was agreed to.
Mr. MADDEN. I ask unanimous consent to agree to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes.
The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the conferees.
The Clerk read as follows:
Mr. SLEMP, Mr. MADDEN, Mr. OGDEN, Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, and Mr. CARTER.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that after the House has concluded with the Attorney General resolution that I may be permitted to address the House for 20 minutes on the bill H. R. 12, a bill to establish a Federal Code.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that after the Judiciary Committee has concluded he may be permitted to address the House for 20 minutes on the bill (H. R. 12) to establish a Federal Code. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

CHARGES AGAINST THE ATTORNEY GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I call up for consideration—

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, just a moment.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. The report made by the Judiciary Committee on House Resolution 425, authorizing the investigation of impeachment charges made September 11, 1922, by OSCAR E. KELLER, a Representative from the State of Minnesota, against Hon. Harry M. Daugherty, Attorney General of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota calls up the report of the Judiciary Committee—

Mr. VOLSTEAD. And I give notice in this connection that I intend to offer the resolution which I would like to have read by the Clerk for the information of the House.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Tennessee rise?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. There was a request made by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE] a few minutes ago. I was on my feet, not to object but to ask something about it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thought nobody objected.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The request that was made would interfere with the business of to-day and was granted—

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood there was no objection; of course, if the gentleman from Tennessee wants to object, the Chair will recognize him. Does the gentleman from Tennessee desire to object?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes; I object to the remarks the gentleman intended to make between the time—the Chair stated it was after the completion of the time of the Judiciary Committee?

Mr. MONDELL. To-day, at the conclusion of the consideration of this measure, as I understand it, but I did not hear the request. After the matters have been disposed of, if there is time to-day.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Of course, Mr. Speaker, whatever arrangement gentlemen on the Republican side have made—

Mr. MONDELL. I was not on the floor when the request was made, and I did not hear it, but I understood the request was—

The SPEAKER. The Chair stated the request and asked, Is there objection? And there was no objection. Is there objection now? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The gentleman from Minnesota offers a resolution to be reported for the information of the House. Without objection, the Clerk will report the resolution.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

That whereas the Committee on the Judiciary has made an examination touching the charges sought to be investigated under H. Res. 425 to ascertain if there is any probable ground to believe that any of the charges are true; and on consideration of the charges and the evidence obtained it does not appear that there is any ground to believe that Harry M. Daugherty, Attorney General of the United States, has been guilty of any high crime or misdemeanor requiring the interposition of the impeachment powers of the House;

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from further consideration of the charges and proposed impeachment of Harry M. Daugherty, Attorney General, and that House Resolution 425 be laid on the table.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer the minority report as an amendment to that report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota does not offer it now for consideration. He says he offers it merely for the information of the House.

Mr. THOMAS. I give notice I shall offer the minority report as an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman at the proper time.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, on the day Mr. KELLER made his charges impeaching the Attorney General he announced to the House that he had evidence to sustain them and asked me for a hearing before the Judiciary Committee. I then arranged with him to have a hearing on the 16th day of last September, five days after he made the charges. No suggestion was then made that that date was not entirely acceptable to him. The committee then met and asked Mr. KELLER what acts his charges referred to and what evidence he had to sustain them, but he positively refused to give the committee the slightest information, insisting that he was not ready, that he wanted an attorney, and asked for postponement. The hearing was then adjourned to the 19th of September. As we all knew that the investigation would require several weeks, and it became evident that Congress was about to adjourn, and did adjourn two or three days after the 19th—with the adjournment of Congress the power of the committee ceased, as it could not sit when Congress was not in session—the committee adjourned the hearing to the first day of the next regular session of Congress. It was evident that neither Mr. KELLER nor the Attorney General was prepared for any hearing at that time.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas). The gentleman will state the point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. I make the point of order that if it were the intent of the gentleman from Minnesota to call up a certain report he has not done so, and there is nothing now before the House, in that there has been no report submitted to the House for business thereon, and until there is such a report placed before the House there is nothing now before the House. Up to this time there has been no report presented to this House. It must be presented for action before the business can be taken up.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The present occupant of the chair was not in the chair at the time the gentleman from Minnesota took the floor.

Mr. BLANTON. The parliamentary situation is as I have stated, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

Report of the Committee on the Judiciary on the charges of OSCAR E. KELLER against the Attorney General of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] is recognized.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, after the hearings on the 16th of September the committee adjourned, as I have said, until the 19th, and again, for the reasons I have stated, adjourned until the next regular session of Congress, on the 4th of December.

This adjournment was promptly seized upon by Mr. KELLER and others as a pretext for abusing the committee. They promptly rushed into print to denounce the committee because such postponement had prolonged the alleged lawless and unfaithful career of Mr. Daugherty as Attorney General. Mr. KELLER, in a letter to the committee and in interviews to the public press falsely charged that this adjournment was ordered by the committee for the purpose of placing the hearing at a time when the committee knew that Mr. Untermyer, who Mr. KELLER stated in his letter had agreed to act as his chief counsel, would be prevented from attending the hearing because of other public duties. The committee had no such knowledge, and the employment of Mr. Untermyer is evidently not true, because now comes this same Untermyer and flatly denies Mr. KELLER's statement. He says in a letter to the committee that he has never sustained any professional relations to Mr. KELLER and that the time when he was asked by Mr. KELLER to represent him in this proceeding was after the hearings had commenced, which was long after this adjournment took place.

A host of cheap political scavengers whose chief occupation in life appears to be to impugn the motives of every public official who does not belong to their muckraking clan, promptly joined the chorus. What possible motive could there be for their attack upon the committee at this time but dirty politics? Mr. KELLER knew that he was not ready to produce evidence, as his subsequent conduct has clearly demonstrated. The explanation is quite easy. He and his henchmen knew, as they must have known, that they did not have any evidence that would support impeachment and that when they would finally be asked to furnish the evidence they had promised they could make no showing. It is an old trick of the shyster lawyer to swear at the court and jury to divert attention from his own shortcomings. It is apparent that they set to work deliberately to blacken the reputation of the committee in the hope that they might thereby escape public condemnation for their dastardly act. If that had not been true, they would not have started to attack long before the committee had any chance to do anything. It has been evident from the very first that both Mr. KELLER and his attorneys have striven to stage a situation that would permit them to make their exit from the investigation as gracefully as possible. Instead of aiding the committee in making an investigation they have repeatedly and persistently refused information and have insulted and thwarted it in every way possible.

As soon as Congress was called in extra session last November the committee prepared to proceed with the investigation. Mr. KELLER was asked to furnish on or before the 1st of last December a detailed statement of his charges and, as far as possible, the date of each transaction complained of, together with the names and addresses of the witnesses by which the charges could be established. In answer to this he filed with the committee a list of specifications, but in a letter accompanying it refused to give the committee the names of any witnesses except as to one charge, though the specifications contain some 53 different charges, some embracing more than one charge.

In this letter he complained that he was given too little time to prepare for a hearing in September, and said he had heard nothing of the charges since then, as though that was the fault of the committee. But, in spite of that, he told the committee that it would take him at least another month before he could prepare his case for a hearing. Everything the committee had done and everything the committee had omitted to do was wrong. The letter is simply an insolent attempt to create the impression that the committee could not be trusted, and that he had been unfairly treated. Repeated demands have been made by Mr. KELLER and his counsel to have this insolent letter printed in the record, though it does not have the slightest evidential value, is not sworn to, and has no proper place there.

As ordered in September, the committee met on the 4th day of last December to hear what Mr. KELLER had to offer. He then again refused to give the committee any information and refused to do anything until it first secured power to subpoena witnesses and send for papers. This is the same KELLER who had filled the public press with denunciation of the committee because it had not held the investigation during the last three days of the session ending in September, a thing he knew was impossible, a thing he was not even prepared for at this late date. It appeared evident to me, and I presume to other members of the committee, that this demand was made for the purpose of delay, if not in the hope that the committee might refuse to comply with it and thus furnish an excuse to Mr. KELLER for refusing to give the committee any information. The committee thereupon authorized me to apply to the House for this power, which was promptly granted, and on the next day, the 5th of December, the committee met again. The committee then determined to take up the charges in the order in which they were set down in the specification and directed me to notify Mr. KELLER and his attorney, Mr. Jackson Ralston, of that fact, which I did. In answer to this notice, I was promptly informed that they would not take the charges up in that order. They insisted on determining the order in which the evidence should be heard, and claimed a right to control the proceedings, though they had absolutely no right to make any such demand; his position was simply that of a witness.

In my letter advising Mr. KELLER and his attorney of this determination of the committee I called attention to the fact that the committee might desire to hear argument upon the question of whether certain of the charges set forth are facts that constitute impeachable offenses. Mr. Ralston informed me that the committee had waived any such question, and refused to present any argument. As no lawyer could seriously urge that the committee could possibly waive such a question, and nothing had occurred to furnish an excuse for such a claim, it was evident that this ridiculous assertion could only be made for the purpose of raising an issue with the committee. This purpose appeared, too, from the general tenor of the letter, which was distinctly discourteous. This purpose became evident on receiving at this time a letter from Mr. KELLER himself covering more than four closely typewritten pages. This insulting and abusive epistle was written before we had been able to secure any evidence. The falsehoods and misrepresentations it contained were well calculated to create a rupture between Mr. KELLER and the committee. It was entirely uncalled for and unprovoked. Its purpose was too clear for doubt. To aggravate the incident, this letter was given to the press. The committee did not propose to help Mr. KELLER to make his exit; it refused to quarrel and ignored the offensive part in both letters. The refusal to argue the question whether a charge stated an impeachable offense brought to my mind the suspicion that the first reading of the specification had occasioned mainly that many of the charges had been purposely drafted in a defective form in order that the committee would decide that they did not state impeachable offenses and for that reason dismiss them. I could not figure out why a lawyer accustomed to draw legal charges should so persistently omit what seemed to me essential allegations. It looked like a trap that it would not be wise to fall into.

Though Mr. KELLER persistently treated the committee in an insolent manner, no attempt was made to resent it; his attacks were ignored. No excuse was given him for refusing to furnish what information he might have. Instead of insisting that a charge must state an impeachable offense evidence was permitted without determining that question; instead of insisting that the charges be taken up in their order, a thing the committee had a right to ask, he was permitted to take them up in whatever order he saw fit; instead of the committee conducting the examination of the witnesses, as is customary in such proceedings, he was permitted to conduct the hearing. The committee allowed him to have an attorney to do that, who conducted it as if it was the trial of a lawsuit. When Mr. KELLER refused to furnish any testimony unless the committee secured power from the House to subpoena witnesses it acceded to the demand, though it is practically certain that the evidence Mr. KELLER produced could have been secured without a subpoena, as subsequent proceedings quite clearly established. Former Attorney General Wickersham was subpoenaed, but his testimony was not at all necessary, as the facts he could testify to were established by records not in issue. Mr. KELLER demanded that Chief Justice Taft be subpoenaed, and I arranged with the Chief Justice to appear and testify, but his presence was finally waived by Mr. KELLER, as the testimony he could give was likewise established by official records. Aside from officials and employees of the Department of Justice and the Interstate Commerce Commission, who came at the request of the committee, the other witnesses were directly or indirectly interested in the prosecution. They represent railway labor organizations or had some private grudge that they wished to air. Mr. Gompers, President of the American Federation of Labor, no doubt could have secured their presence. He admitted that he was instrumental in having the charges in regard to which they testified inserted in the specifications, and that the attorney of the federation conducted the proceeding for Mr. KELLER.

The claim that I made the statement after hearing evidence on two charges that judging by that testimony it was evident that there was nothing to any of the charges, is absolutely false. The remark which was seized upon and misrepresented had reference to one charge only, as the context clearly shows, and does not refer to the evidence at all but to the law applicable to that particular charge; and though I promptly called the attention of the press to this false statement (see page 386 of the hearings), it failed to correct it. Evidently the correction would not make a news story. I tried to secure other corrections with like results, as will appear from page 378 of the hearings.

One of the absurd things in the critics of this investigation is that they appear to assume that to be fair the committee must act in the august and dignified manner that they expect of a court, and that every cross-examination of the witnesses or criticism of the evidence offered is proof of prejudice. The committee occupies no such position. It is an inquisitorial body made up of lawyers whose duty it is to examine and cross-examine witnesses, and there is no reason whatever why it should hesitate to express its disapproval, as a court often does, of anything that is unfair, whether it is for or against the person who is accused. Impeachment is a criminal proceeding; the accused has a right to expect decent treatment. It is not only unfair to the accused to allow such a proceeding to degenerate into a vehicle for giving publicity to unfounded campaign stories, but it is also an imposition on the committee to try to create a public impression that these stories are true, when no evidence is offered to establish them. If the public is deceived by such stories, the committee must bear the odium of not making its recommendations square with public expectation when in their report they are compelled to disregard them. The House can not use such evidence to convict anyone in the Senate. Against such methods the committee does not only have the right but it is its duty to protest.

Mr. KELLER and others who helped to start this investigation had no right to control the proceedings. They simply occupied the position of witnesses. They had no other duty or function than to give the committee whatever information they had. They had no right to arrogate to themselves, as they did, the position of public prosecutors. Mr. KELLER repeatedly talked about the proceeding as his case. Had Mr. KELLER treated a court the same as he treated the committee he would promptly have gone to jail, as no court would have tolerated for a moment the insolent and abusive behavior.

The claim made by Mr. KELLER that he did not dare to give the names of his witnesses to the committee for fear that the Attorney General and William J. Burns, of the Bureau of Investigation, might intimidate or interfere with them, is clearly nothing but a subterfuge. He refused to give them because he knew of none. The suggestion assumes that the committee could not be trusted, though it should be as able to judge whether any such danger existed and would be as much under obligation to guard against it as he. It is evident that such a statement could not be true as to many witnesses if they are of a character to be relied on. To establish some 50 or 60 different charges it would be necessary to have a large number of witnesses, as they relate to a large variety of transactions. It is not a case of withholding the names of one or two, but the names of all the witnesses that Mr. KELLER claims to have were withheld except as to two charges. It is apparent that the danger of any such interference or intimidation would be very remote. The Attorney General and Mr. Burns are not accused of being idiots. One of the most damaging things that could have occurred to the Attorney General and Mr. Burns would be to have the witnesses disappear or refuse to testify to what they might have assured Mr. KELLER they would testify to. If I had any suspicion that Mr. KELLER knew of any witnesses by which he could establish any impeachable offense I would ask the House to cause him to be arrested and kept in confinement until he agreed to testify, but I am certain that that would bring no results and that it would only give Mr. KELLER an opportunity to pose as a martyr, a thing I do not care to promote.

On the 12th day of last December Mr. KELLER was again repeatedly asked to give the committee the names of witnesses by whom he expected to establish his charges. He then admitted that he did not know of any witnesses as to several of these charges. If any one will read that hearing and study the evasive and shifty answers of Mr. KELLER in regard to what he knew about witnesses, and note the industrious care that his attorney took to protect and help him, I do not believe that he can have the slightest doubt as to the actual facts. In the letter in which he made his melodramatic exit he accused the committee of attempting to whitewash the Attorney General. If Mr. KELLER knows of any witnesses that can establish his charges, he is the one who is guilty of whitewashing the Attorney General in that he refuses to furnish the information to establish guilt. The committee has not refused to call or examine any witness whom he has suggested. The committee, as I have said, permitted him to control the proceedings and to introduce his evidence through an attorney as though the hearing was a lawsuit, though that is contrary to the custom in such cases. He knows that with such a procedure it would be impossible for the committee to whitewash. Whatever evidence is offered is taken down by an official stenographer sworn to correctly report it. Every syllable of that evidence is printed in the very language that the witness gives it and becomes a public record. Not only is that true, but all evidence is taken at public hearings in the presence of hundreds of spectators, many of them newspaper reporters, who take the evidence in shorthand to send it to the press for publication. The committee is simply the instrumentality through which the House obtains the evidence. It does not finally determine the matter. It is the House that decides whether there is evidence that justifies impeachment. No one, so far as I am aware, has claimed, and no one can honestly claim, that the committee refused to admit any competent evidence.

It not only admitted all competent evidence offered by Mr. KELLER but much that was so plainly incompetent that even Mr. KELLER's attorney in offering it admitted that it was not proper testimony. Instead of insisting that Mr. KELLER and his attorney confine their evidence to what would be proper under the rules of law, the committee to forestall the complaint that evidence was excluded allowed them to practically offer anything they saw fit, and did not even question whether the evidence was of acts that would constitute impeachable offenses. Had the committee refused to admit proper evidence or otherwise shown a disposition to be unfair, the newspapers would have promptly condemned the committee. Mr. KELLER and his friends are not only condemning the committee but they are condemning the newspapers as well, because they have not joined in a dishonest attempt to muckrake the committee and the Attorney General.

It has even been charged that the committee is packed. A person who makes such a charge in face of the actual facts is simply trying to mislead the public. This is not a special committee selected for the purpose of investigating these charges. Mr. KELLER himself selected this committee as the one to make this investigation; but no sooner had he done that and before the committee had had a chance to do anything he set to work to vilify and abuse it by publishing a lot of false charges against it. Most of its members have been on this committee for many years. It is composed not only of Republicans but of Democrats as well. The Democrats would naturally be just as anxious to expose any corrupt act that could honestly be charged against the Attorney General as Mr. KELLER could possibly be. The only thing that stands in the way of their joining in this muckraking attempt is the fact that they have too high regard for their own character and for decency in public service. Many of the leading Democratic papers, whose reporters have been present at these hearings, have condemned Mr. KELLER and his associates just as vigorously as have Republican papers.

Mr. KELLER offered testimony on only two charges. It is hardly necessary to comment on that testimony, as I know of no one who considers it of sufficient consequence to merit consideration. One of those charges is based upon the idea that the Attorney General should be impeached because he appointed William J. Burns head of the Bureau of Investigation. The charge grows out of the fact that in 1911 in an ex parte proceeding, for the purpose of obtaining a pardon, it was claimed that in 1905—some 17 years ago—Mr. Burns packed the jury in one of the Oregon land-fraud cases so as to secure a conviction. The judge who tried the case, the attorney who prosecuted it, the employee of the Department of the Interior who was there investigating jurors, the assistant clerk of court—the clerk being dead—and Mr. Burns all denied it. Senator JOHNSON of California, who knew Mr. Burns intimately in connection with the California graft cases, in which Burns was connected immediately after this trial in Oregon, indorsed Mr. Burns in the strongest terms as a man of sterling integrity. It was a charge that no one had heard of until more than five years after the trial. Personally, I am satisfied that it was without foundation, but whether true or false is not material. There is nothing to show that the Attorney General did not come to the same conclusion that I have, and there is ample evidence upon which to base such a conclusion. But, even if he had believed that 17 years ago Mr. Burns had been guilty of the charge, it would not furnish any ground at this time for impeachment. Mr. Burns is unquestionably a very capable official, and there is no charge that he is not performing his duties honestly and efficiently.

The evidence that Mr. KELLER offered as to the alleged failure of the Attorney General to enforce the railway safety appliance law was so flimsy that his own attorney in effect admitted that it did not sustain the charge, and so did one of his main witnesses, who was also a lawyer. It is perfectly obvious that it was the strike of the shopmen and other railway employees that made it impossible to keep railway equipment in safe condition during the strike, which was the time when it was alleged that the failure occurred. The Attorney General can not be impeached because the shopmen struck.

It was after evidence had been introduced on these two charges that Mr. KELLER refused to proceed. As he claimed that he had evidence as to his other charges, the committee secured a subpoena and had it served, requiring him to appear and testify, but, as you all know, he refused to obey the subpoena.

We then asked Hon. ROY O. WOODRUFF, who had made certain charges against the Attorney General in a speech in the House, and had written me a letter offering to furnish evidence, to appear before the committee. In response to this he appeared and asked an opportunity to examine the records in the Department of Justice, and that he might for that purpose be assisted by an attorney. This request was granted, and he employed as such attorney a former employee of that department, who was thoroughly familiar with these charges and actively hostile to the Attorney General. After he made an examination of the records in the department he appeared before the committee and repeatedly stated that he had no criticism to offer of the manner in which the cases were now being handled. He said they were being carried on by men of high standing and with the greatest expedition possible.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. WOODRUFF. I would like the gentleman to state also that while I was before the committee I did disclose to the committee the fact that the Wright-Martin case, the case of which I complained—

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I will discuss that, and give the gentleman an opportunity to answer if he desires.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Will the gentleman allow me to continue my question?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I will deal with that case, and then I will give the gentleman an opportunity.

In line with his former complaints, Mr. WOODRUFF, however, sought to create the impression that prior to his speech in the House there had been too much delay in these prosecutions, and said that he had heard that somebody in the Department of Justice had told somebody some months ago that the so-called cantonment cases had been closed up; though they have since been sued. Mr. Goff, the Assistant Attorney General who had been in charge of these cases since the Attorney General was appointed, testified that they had been under constant consideration and that there had been no unnecessary delay.

As evidence of delay in the prosecution of the Wright-Martin Aircraft Co. case Mr. WOODRUFF pointed to the fact that though it was about a year since the War Department certified the claim against that company to the Department of Justice it had not yet been sued, though action was about to be brought. He seemed to think that as soon as a claim is sent to the Attorney General suit must at once be brought without any investigation as to whether there is any evidence to sustain an action or not. Possibly that might be good politics.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. The gentleman can explain later on. In this case it appears from the testimony that there has been considerable difference of opinion among the attorneys in the Department of Justice as to whether the Government could recover at all, but, of course, a small matter like that should not delay a little suit for $3,000,000 depending only on a few wagonloads of figures. There is certainly no sense in having an audit based on the Attorney General's theory of the case, nor in doing any such foolish thing as to see whether there is any chance of having the case adjusted without suit, as was done in this case. It is clear that the Justice Department must not delay. It has no business to hesitate. He who hesitates is lost, and any Attorney General who arrogates to himself the right to use his own judgment rather than that of the War Department as to what suits he can maintain should be impeached. Why, he ought to bring his suit at once, and then send out and see if he can find any evidence to support it. He can not introduce the evidence anyway until the case comes for trial, and that takes months after the suit is brought. The trial of one of these suits does not cost so very much; perhaps a hundred thousand. It usually does not take more than three or four months to try one, and the Government is rich, it can stand it if a mistake is made because there has been no proper preliminary examination. The loss of a suit of this kind and $100,000 in cost is nothing in these days when we talk billions.

But his chief complaint is that the Attorney General did not come to Congress in time to ask for more money with which to run the department. I admit that is serious. It appears from the testimony that he really tried to get along without making such a request. He actually called his force together and asked and secured their consent to work longer hours; and, though the usual quitting time in the departments has been 5 o'clock, his force uniformly worked until 7 o'clock in the evening, and many of them came back after the evening hour and worked much later. Can anyone believe that this was because of any devotion to the public service? Why, certainly not; it is a thing that must be stopped. But it would appear that it was the purpose of the Attorney General to continue this policy because, for fear the work might give out should some of the criminals escape, he asked and had Congress change the law so as to extend the time within which prosecutions could be had from three to six years. Every Attorney General or other Cabinet officer who tries to get along with what force he may have and does not ask for every cent that is in the Treasury ought to be impeached, but fortunately that is an offense that can not be charged against a great many public officials. I hope, however, that my friend will condone this offense, as he says he has no complaint of present conditions.

At the conclusion of the testimony offered by Mr. WOODRUFF the committee asked that the persons in the Department of Justice, who have been in charge of the various matters complained of, be sworn and examined on oath for the purpose of ascertaining if there was any reasonable ground to believe that any of the charges were true. A large number of such witnesses were so examined. From the nature of the charges it is evident that the evidence of such witnesses would in nearly all instances be controlling. No Attorney General is expected to have personal charge of any considerable number of cases pending in his department. The work must necessarily be done by district attorneys, assistants to the Attorney General, and other employees in the Department of Justice. It is evident that when a matter has been in charge of some particular person he is the one who knows what has been done and what part, if any, the Attorney General has had in its management. The committee sought to get evidence on all the charges, except one or two, that were by unanimous consent considered too frivolous to merit attention. The taking of testimony was continued until all the members of the committee were apparently satisfied that nothing could be gained by any further hearing. A motion was then made to consider the hearings closed, and this was agreed to by a unanimous vote. Of course, this would not preclude the committee from reopening the hearings if any good reason should have appeared for so doing.

It is apparent that there was a design to make the investigation indeterminable and inconclusive by multiplying charges and demanding investigations that would make it impossible to reach a result. The specifications contain more than 50 different charges, and Mr. KELLER has repeatedly insisted on the right to file additional charges whenever he should see fit. In the investigation of these charges, and for the express purpose of enabling him to discover other causes of complaint, he made a demand upon the committee that it procure from the Attorney General all letters, telegrams, briefs, memoranda of conversations and conferences, reports of bureaus, investigators, and agents, and all other papers and documents of any kind whatsoever in the files of the Department of Justice or of said Harry M. Daugherty in connection with or in any manner related to some 147 different cases; and that in addition thereto the committee call upon the Federal Trade Commission for the production of all correspondence with the Department of Justice and of all papers, documents, and evidence transmitted by that commission to the Department of Justice since the 1st day of January, 1921; and that the War Department and the Navy Department be requested to produce all correspondence between those departments and the Department of Justice, together with all documents transmitted by those departments to the Department of Justice since the 1st day of January, 1920. To comply with such a request would have put the Department of Justice practically out of business and would have loaded this committee with records requiring years for it to consider. Mr. Howland, who appeared for the Attorney General, said, though he offered to furnish the committee anything asked for, that it would take a trainload to haul the mass of records demanded by Mr. KELLER from the Attorney General's office to that of the committee, and that it would require a lifetime to read them. Was there no sinister purpose in making such a request? Mr. KELLER knew that this was not a general investigation, and that he had no right to ask for any paper that he did not have reasonable ground to believe would prove some specific fact that had been alleged as an impeachable or criminal act.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Do I understand, then, the attitude of the committee is to impeach Mr. KELLER?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I do not think that is a pertinent question. Mr. KELLER has attempted to impeach the committee as well as the Attorney General, and I am simply calling attention to what he has done.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Well—

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I refuse to yield further.

Was the number of the charges against the Attorney General multiplied and the demand for documents made all embracing so as to enable parties interested in these cases to find out what evidence the Government had or what proceeding it contemplated? Is there not some reason to suspect that the Attorney General was correct in his suggestion that this demand must have been made for the purpose of enabling those who are being prosecuted, either civilly or criminally, to obtain information that would aid them in defeating the just claims of the Government? It has been repeatedly stated that Mr. KELLER had 14 different attorneys who all had volunteered to prosecute these charges without pay; are they really disinterested patriots or have they some ax to grind?

The purpose to prolong this hearing indefinitely appears not only from the number of the charges and the demand for documents but from what has taken place since the committee announced completion of the hearings. When the hearings were closed on the 21st day of December the committee publicly announced that it would meet on the 4th day of January to consider its report, and it was generally expected that the report would then be made. On that day Mr. Ralston, attorney for Mr. KELLER, Samuel Gompers, and the American Federation of Labor, who had bowed himself out of the committee room at the time Mr. KELLER made his exit with the statement that his connection with the case had ended, wrote the committee a letter in which he announced his willingness to argue the question of whether certain of the charges stated an impeachable offense, and this he did despite his former refusal to argue any such question. On this same 4th day of January Mr. Untermyer had this same sort of an impulse. He, too, felt called on to write the committee. Of course no one has any right to surmise that it was more than an accident that these three things all occurred on the same day; but one thing appears quite certain, Ralston and Untermyer, despite the latter's denial of his relation to this investigation, have been among those chiefly interested in pushing it, and now both of them, on the day when they no doubt expected that their letters could not reach the committee until after the committee would have made its report, are bidding for a reopening of the hearing. There had been ample opportunity to present their petition at an earlier date. The committee is not in need of Mr. Ralston's advice. He has not shown any special desire to assist the committee, and so far as is known he has no knowledge that the members of the committee do not possess. Mr. Untermyer in his letter says that he knows nothing about any of the charges except those relating to the cases he turned over to the Attorney General as counsel for the Lockwood committee.

He does not claim that the Attorney General's conduct in regard to these cases is impeachable. His malice against the Attorney General would, I am sure, help persuade him that it is. Still, he says in the letter that—

It may be that they are not impeachable; I don't know. I have not at any time expressed an opinion on that subject.

But he insists that the committee should nevertheless enter into an investigation, a thing it has no power to do unless the charges are impeachable. He scolds and abuses the committee because it has not done what he concedes it may not have the duty or power to do. The cases that he refers to were promptly turned over to Colonel Hayward, district attorney of New York, who appeared before the committee and testified. He said that he had made an examination of all these cases, and for that purpose asked and obtained from the Attorney General a large force of investigators; that the Attorney General had given him every possible assistance; and that in a number of these cases suits and prosecutions had been instituted, some of which are pending. In other cases decrees or convictions have been secured. In these prosecutions violators of the Sherman antitrust law have for the first time been sent to prison, though that law has been on the statute books for more than 30 years. The testimony of Mr. Hayward might indicate that Mr. Untermyer may have had a motive for his attack. He is an assistant attorney general for the State of New York. As such I presume it is his duty to prosecute violations of the New York statute. Mr. Hayward says that a number of the cases that Mr. Untermyer turned over to the Attorney General were State and not Federal cases. If this is true—and there can be no doubt about it—his attack looks a good deal like an attempt to pass the buck to divert attention from his own delinquency. Why should not Mr. Untermyer be impeached for the same reason that he urges the impeachment of the Attorney General?

Now, I would like very much to go through all of the evidence, but there is not time to do it in such a way as to give the House any insight into the charges and the testimony relevant to them. I simply want to say this, that so far as I am aware, there is not one member of the Committee on the Judiciary that believes that the evidence sustains a single charge impeaching Harry M. Daugherty, whether he is a Republican or a Democrat.

It seems to me that the resolution that I am going to offer ought to pass unanimously. The suggestion that we ought to continue this investigation rests upon nothing but politics. The presumption is that a man is not guilty. We have made a careful investigation and nothing has been developed from any source, nothing has been developed from those who have made charges, they have absolutely refused to give us any information, they are trifling with this House and are insulting this committee charged with the investigation. There can be but one course for this House to pursue, and an investigation that is neither justified by anything that has been accomplished or by anything that can be accomplished. No one has or can point to a single offense capable of proof. The resolution should be passed. [Applause.]

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman is aware, of course, that under the rules of the House an adverse report by a committee upon a proposition before it sends that to the table. Now, why is it that the gentleman's committee, having reached the conclusion and having made the report adversely, places this upon the calendar and then asks us upon this solemn matter of impeachment to vote on the question as to the finding of facts? Why is not the gentleman content to let the matter die without having the House vote upon it?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I was not aware that the House had any objection against passing upon it. In the first place, I think, as you, that these are solemn charges, and if they are not true they ought to be disposed of; the House ought to be willing to take time to consider them and vote upon them.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Never before in an impeachment case, where the resolution of impeachment has been reported on adversely, has the House been called upon to pass upon it.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Well, I have not examined all the precedents, possibly you have.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman knows the facts. Many of us do not know the facts. Why should we have to vote upon the question of fact?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I do not think that is true, if the gentleman will pardon me. I think in many cases we are called upon to vote upon facts. We are called upon to do that whenever there is a contest for a seat in this House; we take the testimony in those cases in the way we have taken it in this case, and that testimony must be considered by the House. [Applause.]

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That is a different proposition.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. J. M. NELSON. I should like to ask the gentleman a question, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Minnesota yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment to the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman offers for information an amendment to the resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House appoint a special committee to inquire into the official conduct of Harry M. Daugherty, Attorney General of the United States, and report whether in their opinion the said Harry M. Daugherty has been guilty of any acts which, in contemplation of the Constitution, are high crimes and misdemeanors requiring the interposition of the constitutional powers of this House.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I reserve a point of order against the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The amendment is only read for information.

Mr. THOMAS. I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY].

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I shall not undertake to discuss the details of the report exhaustively, as the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] has done, but my disagreement to the concluding portion of the majority report is so strong that I can not consent to permit it to go into the Record without a denial of the proposition announced therein.

On page 3, the committee concludes as follows:

Your committee is of the opinion that Mr. KELLER was legally required to obey said subpoena and that the excuse he submitted through his said attorney is without any merit; that the House of Representatives possesses the power to cause him to be arrested and confined in prison until he shall consent to testify, such confinement not to extend beyond the term of this Congress, and power to otherwise deal with him so as to compel obedience to the summons.

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KELLER] is a Member of this House, and the resolution of impeachment, which is the basis of the committee's action, was first presented by him on the floor of the House.

Mr. Speaker, I challenge the conclusion of the committee and deny the authority claimed to inhere in the House.

Mr. Speaker, my regret that the committee arrived at such a conclusion is heightened by the fact that the view of the committee is supported by a very learned and exhaustive brief prepared by my colleague [Mr. SUMNERS of Texas]. But in view of the fact that the action of the committee, unless challenged, may perhaps be cited as a precedent in future cases of a similar character, I can not in obedience to my sense of duty fail to embrace this opportunity to refute it. The majority in their brief take the position that the principle of parliamentary privilege as known under the Constitution and as provided in section 6 of Article I was adopted from the British parliamentary system, and that therefore American parliamentary privileges are the same as the British, and that under the British system the privilege from arrest guaranteed to members did not apply in behalf of a member as against the Parliament itself. Coming to that conclusion, they hold to the view that, therefore, the privilege of freedom from arrest attaching to a Member does not attach to him in any proceeding in which the House is the actor.

At the outset I should like to observe that gentlemen must remember that the British Parliament was absolutely omnipotent. No written constitution limited its powers. Under the British system the Parliament's dictum amended the British constitution. The laws of Parliament themselves are in fact the British constitution. There is no higher British law, no limitation on its authority. The law of Parliament is paramount. British parliamentary privilege was created by Parliament and could be changed or modified at its will. Though it might create parliamentary privilege, it could at its will violate or destroy that privilege, because the latest expression of its will is the supreme law of England.

The brief prepared in support of the contention of the committee quotes from Blackstone the following comment on the privileges of Parliament:

It is in the power of the Parliament and doth not bind the Parliament itself.

In other words, it is in the power of Parliament to make or to unmake, to create or to destroy. And being within the power of Parliament, privilege does not bind Parliament, because merely by its will does it exist at all, and being subject to its will, it does not, of course, bind Parliament when it wills otherwise.

But under the American system of a written Constitution the limitations of power provided by the people in the Constitution attach as well to the Congress as they do to the other branches of the Government. The Supreme Court of the United States well said in Hepburn v. Griswold (8 Wallace, 611):

The Constitution is the fundamental law of the United States. By it the people have created a Government, defined its powers, prescribed their limits, distributed them among the different departments, and directed, in general, the manner of their exercise. No department of the Government has any powers other than those delegated to it by the people. All the legislative power granted by the Constitution belongs to Congress, but it has no legislative power which is not thus granted. And the same observation is equally true in its application to the executive and judicial powers granted respectively to the President and the courts. All these powers differ in kind but not in source or in limitation. They all arise from the Constitution and are limited by its terms.

It may also be observed that not even are all powers of government distributed among the three branches of the Government. The tenth amendment to the Constitution provided that—

The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution nor prohibited by it to the States are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people.

The decision of the Supreme Court and the amendment just quoted clearly illustrate the fundamental principles that must govern in an examination of constitutional authority.

If the court was correct when it said—

All the legislative power granted by the Constitution belongs to Congress; but it has no legislative power which is not thus granted—

Where but in the Constitution are we to search for the powers which it may properly claim? Where shall we look for its power over its Members? Where shall we look for a definition of parliamentary privilege guaranteed to its Members? Was congressional privilege created by Congress or by the Constitution? Is it "in the power of the Congress and doth not bind the Congress itself" or is it in the Constitution and being there "doth bind the Congress"? Parliamentary privilege is not the creature of the Congress; its claim for existence is the same as that of the Congress itself—the Constitution. Parliamentary privilege and the Congress emerged from the Convention Hall in 1787 side by side. The Congress can no more rightfully destroy or deny the privilege that under the Constitution attaches to a Member than it can lawfully enact an ex post facto law. It has no power to do either. Congress did not make parliamentary privilege; neither can Congress unmake it.

What are the sources of the power of Congress in this regard? Section 6 of Article I of the Constitution provides:

They—

That is, the Senators and Representatives—shall in all cases, except treason, felony, and breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest during their attendance at the session of their respective Houses, and in going to and returning from the same.

The courts have held that by the language—treason, felony, and breach of the peace—are meant indictable crimes; in other words, that the parliamentary privilege does not protect a Member against arrest for an indictable crime. The majority of the committee also contend that this privilege does not protect a Member against arrest by the House of which he is a Member for failure to testify before a committee of the House.

Now, the grants of power to the House over its membership are contained in other sections of the Constitution.

Section 5 of Article I provides:

A majority of each (House) shall constitute a quorum to do business; but a smaller number may adjourn from day to day, and may be authorized to compel the attendance of absent Members, in such manner, and under such penalties, as each House may provide. Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its Members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a Member.

My contention is that in construing constitutional grants the construction adopted must be such as to harmonize and give effect to all portions of the instrument, although they may seem to be contradictory. Such a construction of the Constitution would establish parliamentary privilege in the exact language of that particular grant, except in so far as it is limited by the other provisions of the Constitution which provide that the Congress may require the attendance of Members, may punish them for disorderly conduct, or may expel them by a two-thirds vote.

My contention is that, with those specific exceptions which the Constitution points out, the parliamentary privilege attaching to any Member is as good against the action of this House as it is against any other branch of the Government. Why? Why the rule of parliamentary privilege? Parliamentary privilege is not simply a privilege of the body itself. It is not simply a privilege that this body can assert in order to prevent some other branch of the Government or strangers from interfering with the deliberations of this body; but parliamentary privilege is also a personal privilege, established for the protection not only of the Member himself but for the higher purpose of preventing his constituents from losing their representation in this body through interference with the person of their Representative.

Now, if this House, according to the view of the Judiciary Committee, has the power to imprison the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KELLER] for his refusal to appear as a witness before the Judiciary Committee, it may imprison him in the common jail of the District of Columbia until the end of this Congress. That imprisonment would amount to the deprivation of representation in this body of the people whom Mr. KELLER represents here. But gentlemen may say, "Has not Congress the right to expel a Member?" Congress has the right to expel a Member, because that power is expressly granted under the Constitution, but when that Member is expelled his constituents have the power and the right under the Constitution to elect a successor to represent them here. But when the House of Representatives asserts the right to take from this floor a Member who represents 200,000 or 300,000 people and incarcerate him in the public jail and prevent the exercise of his duties on the floor of this House, because he refuses to testify before a committee, it violates the very principle upon which the constitutional privilege was established. [Applause]. It violates the right of the Member and, through depriving his constituents of his services, denies them opportunity to choose another to serve in his stead.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman permit an interrogation?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Very briefly. I am pressed for time.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. When the House proceeds against a Member for disorderly conduct, may they not take him from the floor of the House and dispose of him so that he shall not represent his constituency?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. By expelling him; yes. I have just said that that power was expressly granted.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Then will you answer one more question?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. You have read the clause of the Constitution which says that protection is granted from arrest except in cases of treason, felony, and breach of the peace?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Are you not aware that that is a provision for the protection of the House and not the protection of the Member?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I have just stated to the gentleman—

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. And has no application to the case of Mr. KELLER.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Of course, I do not enter a constitutional combat with the gentleman from Pennsylvania with any degree of boldness.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. We will waive that.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I will suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that I had just observed a moment ago that the House could expel a Member, because the power was expressly granted in the Constitution in so many words. If the gentleman will wait a moment, I shall remind him that I had laid down the proposition that the House may punish a Member for disorderly conduct, and the source of the power is found in the Constitution, wherein it says in so many words that the House has the power to punish for disorderly conduct, but that grant is limited by its own terms, as well as other parts of the instrument.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Does not this case come under that? Is it not disorderly conduct when a subpoena has been signed by the Speaker of the House and served upon him and he does not answer?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. The gentleman asserts that the House has the power to arrest and imprison Mr. KELLER on the ground that he is guilty of disorderly conduct?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. In refusing to obey a subpoena of the House.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I do not yield any further. The gentleman propounded a question and I am going to answer. In what does disorderly conduct consist? What is the charge against the Member? Is it that Mr. KELLER made remarks against the Judiciary Committee which provoked an altercation? No; it is not that he fought or used rough language, but that he did neither. The charge is not that he made too much noise, but that he did not make any noise at all. The gentleman from Pennsylvania says he ought to be imprisoned because he did not appear and testify. In what degree could that be considered disorderly conduct? His failure to testify before the Judiciary Committee, according to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, would make him guilty of disorderly conduct and therefore subject him to imprisonment. Of course, even gentlemen who are not lawyers recognize that that announcement by the gentleman from Pennsylvania is not a reasonable one. I thought the gentleman assumed that the power claimed by the committee was based on the general principle that the parliamentary privilege was not good as against the action of the House in general.

As a matter of fact, the House has never claimed the power to punish a Member even for disorderly conduct except by censure of expulsion.

The clause in which it is provided that the Member can not be questioned in any other place for his action and speech here on the floor of the House, of course, is operative on agencies outside of this House. If the Member should be disorderly in the House, under the language of the Constitution conferring authority to punish disorderly conduct, the House could punish him, but in punishing him it must punish for disorderly conduct, not something else. And it is pertinent to observe just here that the specific grant of power to punish a Member for disorderly conduct, under a familiar rule of construction, impliedly excludes the power to punish a Member for any other cause. I want to suggest to the House that the freedom of speech also involves the freedom of silence. A Member has a right to speak or not to speak before the committees and on this floor.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Would it be possible for a man to be guilty of disorderly conduct by sitting in silence?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. No; except before the Judiciary Committee of this House. [Laughter.]

Mr. J. M. NELSON. And especially when he is so advised by his attorney.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I do not think that affects it. But before I leave the questions propounded by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] let me answer his suggestion that the constitutional privilege is a provision for the protection of the House and not the protection of the Member. If the privilege be merely the privilege of the House and not a privilege personal to the Member, for the benefit of himself and constituents, why does it extend to the Member not only during the session of the House but "and returning from the same"? After the House shall have adjourned the Member is protected during his return to his home and to his constituents. If arrested, must the Member remain in custody until Congress reconvenes and asserts its privilege? No; he asserts his own privilege by habeas corpus, if need be. May I refer the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] to Cooley on Constitutional Limitations, section 134, wherein it is said:

This—

privilege is not the privilege of the House merely but of the people, and is conferred to enable him to discharge the trust confided to him by his constituents.

If the privilege attaches to the Member for the benefit of the people, is it not, then, the privilege of the people themselves? And that being true, does it not clearly follow that it is protected by the Constitution from the touch of Congress as well as from violation by other departments of the Government?

Jefferson's Manual is clear on that point:

This privilege from arrest, privileges, of course, against all process the disobedience to which is punishable by an attachment of the person, as a subpoena ad respondendum, or testificandum, or a summons on a jury, and with reason, because a Member has superior duties to perform in another place. When a Representative is withdrawn from his seat by summons, the * * * people whom he represents lose their voice in debate and vote, as they do on his voluntary absence. * * * The enormous disparity of evil admits no comparison.

No question absolutely similar in all respects to this case has ever been definitely determined in this House. Of course, you may find precedents where Members of the House have appeared before committees and testified voluntarily, but there is no precedent in the parliamentary history of the United States where a Member has been compelled to testify, except in the case of John Bell, a Member of this House from Tennessee, who finally testified, but testified over his protest. He did not refuse, and therefore the House was not confronted with the question of whether it would undertake to imprison him or to otherwise punish him.

John Bell, of Tennessee, in making his protest made a splendid and convincing argument in favor of the doctrine which I am undertaking to announce. It was during the administration of President Jackson. Bell had made a speech or address on the floor of this House. There was much talk and rumor about misconduct in the executive departments. President Jackson addressed a letter to a committee of the House suggesting that they bring before the committee gentlemen who had made speeches which charged corruption, and require them to testify. Evidently there then existed a purpose, just as there seems to be a purpose in this case, that if anyone lifted their voice here in the House in an attack on an executive department, the powerful influence of the executive departments should be brought to bear to induce some committee to hale before the committee the Member or Members and that the prosecution should be turned on them and that they should be heaped with obloquy and humiliation and made the real object of the attack; that they should be badgered and cross-examined as to their speeches and statements in the House.

Now, here is what John Bell said, among other things, in protest:

"I therefore protest against the course of the committee in subjecting me to such an examination as a private injury, a gross personal injustice, and an act, in its consequences to me, oppressive, tyrannical, and without any sufficient ground of public interest or necessity to justify it.

"I protest against it as an emanation of executive power and influence unconstitutionally exerted over the proceedings of the House of Representatives, an influence wholly incompatible with the due independence of Congress as a coordinate department of Government.

"I protest against it as a violation of my privileges as a Member of the House of Representatives, the committee having no rightful power to summon or examine me as a witness in the manner proposed. The Constitution declares (Art. I, sec. 6) in relation to this subject that—for any speech or debate in either House, they—shall not be questioned in any other place.

"This protection will amount to nothing if I may be put upon trial before this committee and be required to answer upon oath as to the grounds upon which I have made statements of any kind in the House, and it is no argument against this objection to say that I may refuse to answer if I think proper.

"I have a right to be free from the conclusions which may be drawn from my silence when questioned under such circumstances.

"I protest against it as a proceeding in derogation of the fundamental powers and privileges of the House of Representatives. Public rumor, uncontradicted by any authentic denial, has heretofore been regarded as evidence sufficient upon which to found statements in debate and to institute inquiries into the abuses of public administration.

"In the House of Commons of Great Britain common fame is held to be sufficient evidence on which to found an impeachment. But who will hereafter enter freely into the debates of Congress upon the numerous questions connected with the purity of the administration? Who will incur the risk of being able to measure his language and qualify his assertions so exactly as to enable him to subscribe an affidavit as to their accuracy when called upon by a committee composed of a majority of his political opponents? I protest against the course of the committee as unprecedented, so far as I know, in the history of a free government; as a direct attack on the public liberty, inasmuch as the perfect freedom of debate in Congress is essential to its preservation; as a proceeding which could only originate or find countenance at a period when the principles of civil and political liberty are either grossly misunderstood or disregarded; as a proceeding fit only to be employed under an arbitrary government as the means of suppressing all inquiry into the abuses and corruptions with which it maintains its unjust authority, and upon these several grounds I might object to answer the interrogatory which has been propounded to me. Yet, as I am of the opinion that the unjust, unconstitutional, oppressive, and personal objects intended to be effected by the author of this proceeding, and the public injury consequent thereupon, would be rather promoted than defeated by my silence, I think proper under all the circumstances to waive all my privileges, whether attached to me as a citizen or as a Member of Congress, and to answer according to my best judgment as to all questions of mere opinion, and according to the best of my knowledge, information, and belief as to all matters of fact, except so far as I may think proper to withhold any matter of private confidence or the names of those from whom I may have received material information."

Mr. EVANS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I regret I have not the time. Gentlemen, I call your attention to the concluding language of the very able and learned brief presented by my colleague [Mr. SUMNERS], wherein he says:

Undoubtedly, circumstances and conditions may develop under which a Member should be privileged from testifying with regard to certain matters. It would seem clearly so with regard to confidential communications and the names of informants with regard to governmental matters, so that all those who may know facts of public importance which should be imparted will not be deterred from approaching a Member by fear of forced breach of confidence and resultant hurt from their superiors.

The gentleman concludes that the House has the power to arrest and imprison Mr. KELLER, but observes that undoubtedly circumstances and conditions may develop under which a Member should be privileged from testifying with regard to certain matters; that it would seem clearly so with regard to confidential communications and the names of informants with regard to governmental matters, so that all those who may know facts of public importance which should be imparted will not be deterred from approaching a Member by fear of forced breach of confidence and resultant hurt from their superiors.

In other words, he holds that the House has power to imprison, and yet that it should not imprison in certain specified cases. That situation suggests very strong reasons for the adoption of such a construction of the language, in view of what was in the minds of those who wrote the Constitution as will give life and vitality to the privilege rather than such a construction as will deny it. If Members ought to be protected as to confidential communications, if they ought not to stand in dread of the fact that information which they have elicited from private sources may be exposed, then there is all the more reason to assume that that thought was in the minds of the makers of the Constitution when they provided that Members should be privileged from arrest and from being required to testify before a committee of this House.

If language is susceptible of two constructions, that one must be adopted which will effectuate the purpose sought to be accomplished. The construction contended for by me gives effect to the privilege in the cases in which the committee says it should be effective; their construction denies the privilege in the very instances in which they assert it ought to protect the Member. May I observe that a liberal construction always should be employed in such cases.

Another rule of construction is that a grant of privilege should be liberally construed. (Doty v. Strong, 1 Pinney (Wis.) 88.)

Among the earliest cases in our jurisprudence it was so held in the case of Coffin v. Coffin (4 Mass. 1), in which the court said:

These privileges are thus secured not with intention of protecting the Members against prosecution for their own benefit, but to support the rights of the people by enabling their Representatives to execute the functions of their office without fear of prosecutions, civil or criminal. I therefore think that the article ought not to be construed strictly but liberally, that the full design of it may be answered * * *

While the language of the Constitution is itself clear, the contention which I maintain is strongly fortified by the rule, that even though the language were ambiguous, it should be liberally construed to give full effect to the privilege.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, the responsibility of a Member of this House is primarily to his constituents. The functions which he primarily has to perform here are to represent the people of the United States and the people who sent him here. While he owes duties to this House, the power of this House over that Member is limited by the language of the Constitution, just as the power of the judiciary over that Member is limited by the Constitution, and the language of the Constitution is that a Member of Congress shall in all cases—not in some cases but in all cases—be privileged from arrest except in the case of treason, felony, and breach of the peace. You may read into that language the further qualification that he may be punished by the House for disorderly conduct, or may be required to attend the sessions of the House when the House has ordered that he attend. With those limitations the constitutional provision protects the Member against arrest in all cases—not in some cases, not in all cases except when he is called before a committee of this House, but in all cases.

Gentlemen are going to contend that under the British system that right was never successfully asserted as against Parliament, but that does not answer the question. The privileges of the British Parliament were much wider than the privileges of this Congress. The wives of members and their servants were subject to the same rule of privilege. A certain privilege attached to their property. Privilege under the British system was more or less uncertain and nebulous, and was kept so by Parliament itself, because Parliament could change it at will. There the doctrine of parliamentary privilege was not reduced to a grant in so many words, but it was a growth through a long period of years. Some new situation would arise in which a member of Parliament would claim a privilege, and Parliament, in examining that particular case, would pass upon it, and thus the privileges of Parliament under the British system grew up, just as did the common law of England grow up. It was a matter of growth; it consisted of many decisions and rulings scattered through the history of Parliament, and it can not be said that when we adopted the principle of privilege that we adopted the British theory of privilege in so many words, because under the British system it was not reduced to a code. When we adopted the doctrine of privilege we adopted it in the exact words of the Constitution, and in those words it was laid down clearly and distinctly, and they limit the Congress just as they limit the courts and the Executive.

The entire theory of the committee is based upon the erroneous assumption that privilege under the Constitution is identical with that under the British parliamentary system. We borrowed the "principle" of privilege, but we did not adopt either the language of Parliament or the principle itself in its entirety. The committee assumes that American privilege was identical with that of Parliament, and then undertakes to ascertain what the privileges of Parliament were at the time of the adoption of the Constitution and seeks to engraft them upon the Constitution as being what the Constitution in fact means. Privilege was neither identical under the two systems, nor does there arise any necessity for resort elsewhere than the words of the Constitution to ascertain its meaning.

Story lays down the rule that when words are plain and clear no necessity for aid from other sources for their construction arises (Story, sec. 401):

Where the words are plain and clear, and the sense distinct and perfect arising on them, there is generally no necessity to have recourse to other means of interpretation.

In other words, if the language of the Constitution is plain and unambiguous there is no occasion to resort to contemporaneous or prior construction to ascertain their meaning.

Commenting on contemporaneous construction, Story says:

Nothing but the text was adopted by the people. And it would certainly be a most extravagant doctrine to give to any commentary then made, and a fortiori, to any commentary since made under a very different posture of feeling and opinion, an authority which should operate as an absolute limit upon the text, or should supersede its natural and just interpretation. (Story, sec. 406.)

In the words of Story—"Nothing but the text was adopted by the people"—the people adopted the plain, simple language of the Constitution, unmodified by any precedent established under a different system and buried in the archives of Parliament.

We must remember always the difference between the American and the British systems. The English people constituted one nation and one government, and its Parliament was supreme. But when the makers of the Constitution met in Philadelphia there was great jealousy on the part of the States and among the people as to the powers of the government to be created. Here were 13 States, as well as the people residing in them, anxious to limit the powers of the Federal Congress.

They did not intend that even Congress should have the power to deny a State or a constituency representation on this floor. They provided that—

Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union—

And so forth.

The whole history of the making of the Constitution bears witness to the intent of the makers to guarantee and protect the right of representation and to limit the power of Congress over its Members and over the right of the people to be represented. It was well said in Hepburn against Griswold, already cited:

All the legislative power granted by the Constitution belongs to Congress, but it has no legislative power which is not thus granted.

All legislative power was possessed by Parliament, but that which was not conferred on Congress was reserved to and still resides in the people. The people granted to Congress only that degree of power over themselves or their representatives that was expressly conferred. The rest they reserved.

The lack of analogy between the privileges of Parliament and that of Congress may be otherwise demonstrated. In the case of Kilburn v. Thompson (103 U. S.) it was claimed that Congress possessed the general power of contempt. The claim that it did was based on the argument that the British Parliament from time immemorial had possessed such a power. In discussing the question the court said:

But the case before us does not require us to go so far, as we have cited it (a British case) to show that the powers and privileges of the House of Commons of England on the subject of punishment for contempts rested on principles which have no application to other legislative bodies, and certainly can have none to the House of Representatives of the United States.

We are of opinion that the right of the House of Representatives to punish the citizen for a contempt of its authority or a breach of its privileges can derive no support from the precedents and practices of the two houses of the English Parliament, nor from adjudged cases in which the English courts have upheld these practices. Nor, taking what has fallen from the English judges, and especially the later case on which we have just commented, is much aid given to the doctrine that this power exists as one necessary to enable either House of Congress to exercise successfully their function of legislation.

That case decided that Congress under the Constitution did not possess the general power of contempt over the citizen that the Parliament possessed. If the Constitution protects the citizen against Congress, why not the Member?

If no aid can be had from the precedents of Parliament, shall we resort to that source for weapons with which to destroy a privilege granted by the Constitution in clear and explicit language to guarantee to the people representation on this floor? Even under the British system it does not appear that Parliament ever imprisoned a member for failure to testify before a committee.

It may be noted that the brief relied upon by the committee quotes Sir Erskine Mays, Parliamentary Practice, page 523, as follows:

There has been no instance of a member persisting in a refusal to give evidence; but members have been ordered by the house to attend select committees. * * * On the 28th of June, 1842, a committee reported that a member had declined complying with their request for his attendance. A motion was made for ordering him to attend the committee and give evidence, but the member having at last expressed his willingness to attend, the motion was withdrawn.

Notice should be taken that the precedent here cited occurred as late as 1842, long subsequent to the adoption of the Constitution, and, of course, was not in the mind of the people when it was adopted.

Because in Williamson v. United States (207 U. S.) it is said:

* * * by text writers of authority in this country it has been recognized from the beginning that the convention which framed the Constitution, in adopting the words "treason, felony, and breach of the peace," as applied to the privileges of the parliamentary body, used those words in the sense which the identical words had been settled to mean in England.

The committee in effect argues that because the words "except treason, felony, and breach of the peace" are to be construed as having the same meaning that those identical words had in England it is therefore to be assumed that privilege in its entirety as it obtained in Parliament was bodily implanted in the Constitution without regard to the language of the instrument. The committee quotes the following:

By a resolution of the Commons, May 20, 1675, "That by the laws and usage of Parliament, privilege of Parliament belongs to every member of the House of Commons, in all cases except 'treason, felony, and breach of the peace.'"

Now, it is perfectly clear from that resolution of the Commons that, whatever the privilege of Parliament may have been, it was not available in cases of "treason, felony, and breach of the peace." But, on the other hand, does the resolution make clear what "privilege of Parliament" means? No; for that definition search must be made of "the laws and usage of Parliament" through hundreds of years. It was as variable as the circumstances of the times required.

The Constitution of the United States defined privilege, and then excepted "treason, felony, and breach of the peace," and the court held that the exception meant what the words meant in England and America at the time they were adopted here. Whatever privilege was in England, whatever it is here, whether like or unlike, it is not available as against "treason, felony, and breach of the peace." There is nothing in the decision that warrants an assumption that the court went further than that.

On the other hand, it can be clearly established that the Constitution did not bodily, in haec verba, or literally adopt British parliamentary privilege. As has been already observed, in England privilege attached to the wives and servants of members; here it does not. There, in some cases, it attached to the property of members; here it does not. There the member was protected for a certain or fixed time after adjournment and before the meeting of Parliament. Here the time is "a reasonable" time, dependent on circumstances. Other differences might be pointed out, but it is believed these are sufficient to prove that they differ widely.

The language of the Articles of Confederation covering privilege was as follows:

Freedom of speech and debate in Congress shall not be impeached or questioned in any court or place out of Congress, and the Members of Congress shall be protected in their persons from arrests and imprisonments during the time of their going to and from and attendance on Congress, except for treason, felony, or breach of the peace.

This language differs even from that of the Constitution. In addition to changes of form and language the words "they shall in all cases" were introduced. They were introduced for a purpose. The variation in language and the introduction of new terms proves that neither provision was adopted literally from England. But the fundamental difference between parliamentary and congressional privilege lies in the fact that parliamentary privilege, according to Blackstone: "But the maxims upon which they proceed, together with the method of proceeding, rest entirely in the breast of Parliament," while congressional privilege "lies in the breast of the Constitution" and not elsewhere. The Parliament could make privilege what it desired—being supreme, it neither desired nor could protect itself or its members against itself. Any statute which it passed was law. No supreme court could declare its acts unconstitutional or beyond its powers.

Now, let me suggest that if the makers of the Constitution intended to adopt literally the privileges of Parliament, if they wished to lodge congressional privilege "in the breast of Congress" as it in England rested "entirely in the breast of Parliament," why did not the convention of 1787 to section 5 of Article I, "Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members," add the following words: "and of its own privilege and the privilege of its own Members"? That would have constituted a simple and clear method of vesting authority in the Houses. Or, if it had been desirable to require joint action of the Houses, the following provision would have sufficed:

The Congress shall determine its own privilege, that of the respective Houses and the privilege of the Members of the two Houses.

The best answer as to why that was not done is that the makers of the Constitution did not want to do that thing; they did not want to place the power "in the breast of Congress." That was the very thing they did not want to do. That was the very thing they wanted to prevent. And so they put it in the breast of the Constitution, where neither the Congress nor the courts nor the Executive could touch it. They were getting away from governments that rested in the breasts of kings, and in the breasts of lords, and in the breasts of Parliaments, upon whose unbridled will there was no written constitutional limitation; and they had determined that each and every department of the Government which they were creating should have limits to its authority set down in written form in the Constitution that was to be the covenant of the American people, both as between themselves and as between themselves and those who should hold places of authority in the Government which it established.

They had gotten rid of a king. It was no longer necessary to guard against the tyranny of kings; but there arose a new necessity to guard against the tyranny of governmental agencies which they were setting up, a necessity to guard against the tyranny of the courts, of the Executive, and of the Congress.

The people were as anxious to prevent Congress from depriving them of representation through the arrest of their Member or Members as they were to prevent the courts from doing so.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Briefly.

Mr. EVANS. Is it the position of the gentleman that disobedience of a subpoena issued by the House for a Member is not punishable, or only that it is not punishable by imprisonment?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. My investigation has not been exhaustive as to that phase of the matter, nor have I sought to make the distinction that the gentleman does, because I have been chiefly concerned with the imprisonment feature, since that is covered in the report of the committee. On principle, however, I would say that the House could not punish at all for failure to testify. But regardless of that question, I do without hesitation assert that the House has no power to imprison a Member because he remains silent, and that is what the committee in its report says the House has the power to do. It certainly could not attach and imprison him.

Mr. Speaker, may I, in conclusion, for a moment point out the fundamentals that underlie the views I have sought to maintain? Congressional privilege is the creature of the Constitution and imposes a limitation on the power of the Houses of Congress, as it does upon the powers of the judiciary and the executive; that the words "in all cases" protects the Member from arrest in every conceivable case except those mentioned in that clause or elsewhere in the Constitution. The privilege attaches not alone to the House itself but is personal to the Member, both for his own freedom and as a guaranty that his constituents may not be deprived of their representation, and it may be asserted against the House itself. The rules of construction should be liberal in order to make effectual the grant of privilege. American privilege is not the counterpart of the British. Only the "principle" of privilege and not the definition of privilege came from England. In the United States it doth not, as in England, "lie in the breast of Parliament," but resides in the Constitution and nowhere else. It differs as widely from the British as does our system under a written constitution differ from the British system under an unwritten constitution that rests in "the breast of Parliament."

If this House possesses the power to imprison the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KELLER] for failure to give testimony before a committee, and that power is not derived from some grant in the Constitution but is inherent in the House independently of the Constitution, and if the Member is invested with no constitutional protection which he can invoke against the will of the House, why can not a majority of the House at its will imprison a troublesome or embarrassing minority and take the minority Members from the floor? For if the power of the House over its Members is not limited by the Constitution, if they possess no freedom from arrest which they may assert against the House, then it may imprison them, not alone for failure to testify before a committee but for any other cause that may suggest itself to the whim of the majority; they have no redress because they may not urge freedom from arrest against the House. Let us assume another case. The Constitution requires a two-thirds vote to expel a Member, but if the Judiciary Committee is correct in its view a bare majority may imprison a Member for the entire life of a Congress.

On the other hand, let me suggest a case in which a constitutional amendment is about to be voted upon—two-thirds, not of the entire membership but only of those present, if a quorum, is required for passage. Would it not be possible for a majority to imprison sufficient Members of the minority to turn the majority into two-thirds of those present?

But gentlemen may say, "Those are extreme cases and may not arise." True, they are extreme cases; but it was for extreme cases that constitutional guaranties were provided. They were fashioned not merely for fair weather but for stress and storm and tempest. Others may say, "No majority would be so tyrannical." But we must not forget that it was to prevent tyranny—to make it impossible, not merely improbable—that human rights were protected by our written Constitution. Constitutional limitations only interfere with those across whose pathway they stand. If there is no limitation on the power of the House in dealing with its Members, what are to be said of the other constitutional guaranties against depriving him of his liberty without due process of law and against unreasonable searches and seizures? If the House may search his mind, why not the house or pocket of a Member?

Mr. Speaker, I trust this House will never announce the monstrous doctrine that it is above the Constitution, that a Member is not protected by that instrument against its aggression; that it will never assert that at the instigation of Members on this floor, or at the instigation of Executive influence or any other influence outside of this Chamber, any committee of this House, or a partisan or angry majority of the House itself can be invested with the power to issue its writs signed by the Speaker and imprison Members in the common jail or other place of confinement simply because they have elected to stand upon their rights and to say nothing when brought before a committee. Just as no power outside this House can cross its portals and question what is said or done here—just so this House should not be allowed to cross the portals of the conscience of Members and with the implements of inquisition punish them for choosing to remain silent. The privilege of free speech involves alike the privilege of silence; there can be no freedom without the liberty of choice. A Member can not be compelled by this House or by a committee of this House to testify unwillingly. [Applause.]

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS].

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to occupy any time in this discussion. The facts developed by the committee, I assume, will be discussed by the chairman of the committee and by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMAS], who has filed a minority report. My own views and position with regard to the pending resolution have already been made public. While I have the floor, however, I will briefly restate my position.

I agree that the evidence which was adduced before the Judiciary Committee does not warrant an impeachment of the Attorney General, and certainly no presumption should operate against the Attorney General merely because many charges were preferred against him. But that does not, in my judgment, justify an affirmative finding such as the majority of the committee has made that these charges were not true with regard to which no prosecution or examination of the character ordinarily employed took place. Only three specifications had been examined when the character of proceedings changed. The prosecutors withdrew. The legal representative of the Attorney General remained. From that time on, with only unimportant exceptions, if any at all, the testimony with regard to these charges against the Attorney General came from the office of the Attorney General and from witnesses called by the legal representative of the Attorney General. Whatever may have been the disposition of the committee, it proceeded without proper equipment to test this information by an intelligent examination or to discover facts, if they existed, to refute it. It was largely an ex parte proceeding as to the charges, except the first three considered, as I view it, leaving the matter too imperfectly explored to warrant a finding as of facts proven with reference thereto.

I want to be fair to the Attorney General. I repeat that the fact that these charges were filed should create no suspicion that they are true. It is the affirmative finding as of fact that they are false to which I can not agree, because, as I see it, neither the truth nor falsity of those charges was established.
